As such, it may be in the financial interests of ISPs to not be regulated as a common carrier, but since there is no real free market, it is NOT in the interests of the end users: it only facilitates apathy towards customer issues and lackluster growth. Mr. Chairman, the internet was born in the United States, but we are currently (as of information from last year) in ninth place worldwide in broadband, behind not only South Korea, Japan, and Hong Kong, but also the Czech Republic and Latvia. Unregulated monopoly business practices are clearly not helping our innovation.

Allowing 'fast lane' access is a sham, as well: There is no way to create a separate pipe from (say) Netflix to a user's home--the nature of the internet is to allow all the traffic to be routed together. What they're really proposing is to upgrade (maybe) their original network, then shut down traffic from companies that don't offer them sufficient kickbacks. Effectively they want to have permission to charge me for my internet service, ask my content providers to pay for them to upgrade (maybe) their networks, CONTINUE to charge my content providers for the one-time upgrade forever, and artificially restrict traffic that comes from companies not offering kickbacks.

And it is no less than a kickback, Mr. Chairman: if I am paying my internet service provider for a certain amount of bandwidth, keeping traffic that I request off of the wire that I am renting from them is fraudulent. The ISPs are already paid (by me, and millions of other end users) for their services. Suggesting content providers (who also pay massive ISP fees for their connections) need to pay to use the other end of the same network is just turning a blind eye to someone on the take.

Internet service providers have always, since the usage of the internet became commonplace, played the role of a common carrier. It is time to regulate them as such.

Thank you for your time.

It is time that all internet providers were re-classified as public utilities/telecom providers.

All ISP's can provide or carry VOIP services and many others that make them at the minimum a telecom provider. All the Cable services provide Internet now and these must be regulated for the good of the community and public interest. Time Warner must NOT be merged with comcast as the public will suffer an immediate loss of competition and price increase as well as service decrease.

It is unconscionable that such a merger would have gotten this far. I demand that you stop it now because any other decision only proves you and the rest of the FCC are complicit.

In essence it would be similar to your bank asking you what you are going to do with the money you just withdrew. At their sole discretion, they could charge you a fee based on your answer and their idea of what that money should be used for.

For the future of our country, the future of business startups, and the future of the Internet. Please keep the Internet neutral.

The internet needs to stay open to all so people may better themselves. The cost of replicating and distributing knowledge is essentially nothing now because of the internet so why should it be restricted and not available to all. Do we want to keep people in the dark or enlighten the world so we may actually progress as a species?

Open internet communications are important. Net neutrality is the moral right thing to do. Allowing preferential speed or content limitation is stifling.

The large telecom companies lobbying you should be regulated to upgrade the infrastructure to meet or exceed those in Europe and Asia rather than try to squeeze exorbitant profit with minimal investment.

No, do your job as an regulative body .... take care of the public interest.

I am very disturbed at the very idea of the FCC sanctioning inequality of internet service to companies, based strictly on their ability to pay high fees. This goes against the very nature of the internet, which is that it is an equal-opportunity communication system. Just imagine the effect on competition across all sorts of sectors of the economy if the companies already possessing higher market share and higher profits can stifle competition by paying more for faster internet service, leaving the competitor's websites slow and frustrating to use. If allowed to happen, loss of net neutrality would rapidly reduce the choices available to consumers of all kinds of services, goods, and ideas.

Please reject this unfair proposal, and keep the internet open. Thank you.

Please don't let the internet belong mostly to the wealthy and powerful. We thrive best on diversity and access to new voices, products, and ideas. Don't let big telecom companies become de facto censors. If this proposal passes, the internet will become only a tool of large commerce and well-funded politicians. All the smaller interests that make the internet the marvel that it is today (no: not hackers) will be shut out. I hope that's not what you want.

I want to express my support for continued Net Neutrality. Do not support efforts by Comcast, AT&T, etc. to create a separate internet speed for their select services, while eliminating the same option for smaller providers.

Please don't show yourself to be a tool of corporate America...step up for the little guy.

This is an outrage! Obama promised net neutrality. What is his (or any other political promise) worth?

Zip. I reckon 90% of people in office are guilty of bait and switch...this is another classic.

The corporate "fix" is in, again.

And with the Courts (stacked with pro-corporate appeasers and fund-raisers) we've just about put "America on eBay" – available for the taking by the shock troops of K-street.

Government has become a big pop machine: Put money in, and out pops corporate policy.

Is that what the Founders envisioned? Is that what our Service members fought and died for?

Or are ya'll getting a few sips of the pop?

Dear Chairman Wheeler,
I hope you're happy. You just screwed millions of consumers with your decision to allowed ISPs to slow access to the web, and yet keep charging the ridiculous prices for lesser quality internet access.

To add insult to injury you also just screwed US businesses that rely on a fast internet for their communications and data needs. This puts us even further behind other nations where their internet speeds and prices are far cheaper and far faster than the US average.

Way to go! You just helped to kill what little chance the online economy had at helping to raise the overall US Economy.

Comcast must have paid you well for your lapdog services.

Please build any net neutrality argument upon solid legal standing. Specifically, this means reclassifying broadband under Title II of the Telecommunications Act of 1934.

706 authority from the Telecommunications Act has been repeatedly struck down in court after legal challenges by telecom companies. Take the appropriate steps to prevent this from happening again.

Dear Members of FCC:

Do what thou wilt shall be the whole of the Law.

As I understand it, you have before you a proposal that would allow big telecom companies to decide who can benefit from fast Internet speed while slowing down (or even blocking) everyone else. As a private American citizen, I'd like to encourage you strongly to deny the proposal or redraft it such that the Internet will remain as free and open as it currently is.

Love is the law, love under will.

The 21st century internet is an integral part of our economy, democracy, and communication systems. America is absolutely dependent on an open internet operating on net neutrality principles.

As such, you have an obligation to regulate it as a utility. Please assert your Title II authority, and stop trying to appease the telecom giants at the expense of everyone else.

FCC moneybags,

My name is Joel Bixel. I live in Michigan, Zip Code 48383.

The proposed 'plan' is so very wrong on many levels. I am against every single sentence. Allowing companies to provide better UTILITIES to companies based on who has the most money is asking for ISP's to overstep their already overstepped bounds and become the policeman of the internet, the internet is not a government agency for you to control and suck the money out of. I realize that you are all pretty corrupt and willing to sell your law and policy making to anyone with a few million but this is disgusting. I thought America was supposed to be Land of the Free home of the Brave. I do not feel free at all, I think you are the most cowardly scumbag this country has produced. I will not stand for this. DO NOT PASS THIS GARBAGE!

Dearest FCC,

Thank you for all of your efforts to ensure freedom of communication and for your interests in the balance between free and regulated speech. I am one of millions who believe that the internet should be the pinnacle of free speech, and that access should be equal and not discriminatory based on monetary concerns. I am blessed to be in the middle class, and would be able to afford increased costs to access the portions of the internet which are currently completely without additional charge to me. Thus, I have full access to all sorts of education, entrepreneurial opportunities, and knowledge. I believe this access should be equally accessible across economic classes. For ISPs to be able to charge differently for different levels of access will have the discriminatory effect of restricting access to the currently free and open internet to those who are poor.

Furthermore, the potential of the internet to spread ideas and communication depends on the number of minds able to communicate. Restricting access on monetary grounds in order to profit a few CEOs is without merit.

Please take careful consideration of your actions regarding net neutrality, and rise above the influence of lobbyists and political concerns so prevalent these days.

Thank you for your time.

This type of pay for access is essentially akin to censorship. Big corporations already control what we see on TV, hear on the airwaves, and often the news channels. The internet is the last hold out where what people see and have access to isn't completely ruled by big corporations. Please vote to keep the internet free and open!

This is an outrage! Obama promised net neutrality. What is his (or any other political promise) worth?

Zip. I reckon 90% of people in office are guilty of bait and switch...this is another classic.

The corporate "fix" is in, again.

And with the Courts (stacked with pro-corporate appeasers and fund-raisers) we've just about put "America on eBay" – available for the taking by the shock troops of K-street.

Government has become a big pop machine: Put money in, and out pops corporate policy.

Is that what the Founders envisioned? Is that what your Service members fought and died for?

Or are ya'll getting a few sips of the pop?

To Chairman Tom Wheeler and the FCC Commissioners——

To the FCC——

Please build any net neutrality argument upon solid legal standing. Specifically, this means reclassifying broadband under Title II of the Telecommunications Act of 1934.

706 authority from the Telecommunications Act has been repeatedly struck down in court after legal challenges by telecom companies. Take the appropriate steps to prevent this from happening again.

Sincerely,

Allowing internet service providers to create internet “fast lanes” and “slow lanes” would do nothing more than allow them to extort payments from companies like Netflix. It’s time to admit that the internet is a public utility, not a private “service.”

How dare they?! As though we're not struggling enough as it is, now our providers are going to make it impossible for those of us that desire to work and contribute to have our own websites without paying an exorbitant fee for this necessity in today's day and age??!!! I don't understand...they're already so rich...why do they always need more and more...at the expense of the very people lining their pockets to begin with? Please don't do this...let the little people have this avenue for their own little businesses to be seen by the world :( So despondent over the state of the world today...it's become such a sad place :(

It's called the information superhighway, not superturnpike. If we go down this road, we'll wind up paying every step along it. Do you want to pay for every query on a search engine? Rent an email account? Or how about just split the internet in half and give away the lion's share to the rich. Money's the yardstick of everything lately, and some people are "more" equal than others.

You say that "NPRM adopted doesn't authorize, it asks whether paid prioritization should be banned." Why should the government and public waste time asking if we want to give up a freedom that has made this country great? We need an Open Internet, end of discussion, case closed. Why are you wasting our time, just want to see if you can slip a SOPA or PIPA-like inside job by us?

Hi,

I use the internet exclusively for listening to radio, for my printed news and for watching television. It is a broadcast medium and is pushing out traditional free over the air communications.

As the future's communications vehicle, it is imperative that it remain free to access, both by providers of content, and easily accessible to users. We need an unimpeded vehicle for mass communications, not one that is reserved for the rich to send their select messages to the masses.

Please reject all calls for the paid-for, two tier system of internet access speeds. This is an abomination for peoples everywhere and needs to be stopped before it progresses further and before it gets a chance to become the norm.

Thank you,

To whom it may concern,

The issue of net neutrality concerns me greatly. In this country that a Princeton study has recently deemed an oligarchy rather than a democratic republic, it is becoming even more crucial that we maintain this last fragment of freedom and equality in the form of open access to information and expression. Money already buys better health care, education, political power, etc. Please leave us our ability to share and exchange information. It would be a travesty to justice do otherwise.

Ending Net Neutrality would be just as much as an egregious mistake as the Supreme Court's Ruling on Citizens United. That ruling corrupted what is left of our democracy by allowing Large Corporate and Moneyed Interests to purchase our Legislative Process. With the destruction of Net Neutrality, the modern date equivalent of the Town Hall Meeting, the hearing of all voices in an equal, level playing field, which is the foundation of any democracy will be extinguished and replaced by the Corporate Point of View. This end of Net Neutrality is not a benefit for the greater good. It is a benefit for Corporate expediency and further control of our Government and People. It is a trashing of the fundamentals embodied in the Constitution of the United States and should not be allowed to happen under any circumstances.

Your proposed path would open the door to widespread discrimination online. It would give Internet service providers the green light to implement pay-for-priority schemes that would be a disaster for startups, nonprofits and everyday Internet users who cannot afford these unnecessary tolls.

I urge you to scrap these proposed rules and instead restore the principle of online nondiscrimination by reclassifying broadband as a telecommunications service.

There should be no discrimination or favoritism when it comes to the Internet. It's bad enough as it is with different monthly fees for different speeds. Don't let this greed get even greedier. Just wondering how providers in Germany, Europe's most economically sound country, can survive or thrive with giving the fastest Internet speed available to everybody for the same low price?!

FCC members,

The Internet has always been a level playing field for anyone to put out content, creativity, innovation and information. It's what's made independent media outlets like Democracy Now! reach a massive audience that would otherwise be relegated to choosing from corporate media channels like Fox News. It's the lifeline that allows small innovators to create a service that reaches almost everyone on the globe. But the FCC's proposal could kill this Internet democracy.

If the FCC passes these rules, huge companies could pay to make their websites faster and easier to use than all of their smaller competitors. The largest and richest broadband providers like Comcast and Verizon argue that they need more money to invest in new networks. But in reality, they are simply increasing profits by building up monopolies that just benefit their shareholders.

We demand that our Internet stay free and open!

To Chairman Tom Wheeler and the FCC Commissioners—

To the FCC—

Please build any net neutrality argument upon solid legal standing. Specifically, this means reclassifying broadband under Title II of the Telecommunications Act of 1934.

706 authority from the Telecommunications Act has been repeatedly struck down in court after legal challenges by telecom companies. Take the appropriate steps to prevent this from happening again.

Small business, education, social change and even family communications depend more on a neutral internet than any other form of communications access. Most of us no longer have land lines, use or use our cellular phones for phone calls. Kids are able to have friends across the country and world that they communicate with, play games with and learn with. Local and targeted blogs and newsletters are increasingly our source of news. We depend on Skype, other chat systems, blogs, and other internet sites large and small for our interpersonal communications, information, social networks, school access/study, entertainment and commerce. Forcing us to cope in a non-level playing field where sites that cannot pay a ransom are effectively blocked is a severe step backwards in our ability to compete globally at home, work and school. Independent researchers, independent musicians and artists, student-run work-study projects, small interest net-zines, scientific discovery and communication, schools and countless others depend on subscribers being able to reach them without restriction.

Large internet providers already charge a huge premium for their services, where even a slow internet connection costs more of a family's or business's income than is warranted. My family already dishes out hundreds of dollars a month to companies like Comcast and AT&T. In addition those providers make plenty of income selling information on their subscribers and advertising revenue. The chosen-content Internet model thrived for a while with companies like AOL. Their time began to fail nearly 20 years ago. The world has moved on to a more equitable model.

Losing net neutrality means that smaller companies, individuals, non-for-profit organizations and other diverse but small-scale internet content is no longer available to everyone. We'll be left with only those companies that large and overly powerful corporate concerns choose to allow access to. Please protect net neutrality and keep the internet the thriving, equal-access environment that is revolutionizing the power of the individual American to productively act, learn, create social change, and earn a living.

It is absolutely imperative for a free, open, robust, and competitive internet that any plans for so called fast lanes be put to bed.

Any allowance for a service provider to give preferential access to an ISP's customers creates an unfair advantage to larger established companies. The golden age of internet commerce and information delivery will be OVER.

Please, for the progress of our society, declare internet service as a Tier II Common Carrier service. All traffic should be treated equally, without discrimination based upon who is serving the information.

The ONLY entities opposed to true neutrality on the Internet are the giant telecom companies which basically serve as monopolies over the markets in which they operate.

What happened to opportunities for everyone? And competition being a good thing? We all know this is wrong. You know it and I know it.. This proposal will allow the rich to get richer and will keep others down. A small number of billionaires can't survive when the rest can no longer fund them.

I use the internet to look for employment because of the economy my job has folded, I use the internet to watch tv because I can no longer afford the greedy cable companies prices! I use the internet as my form of entertainment because I can no longer afford anything else!!! We have already been suffering at the hands of so much greed, we have NO choice in cable providers as it is, no competitive pricing, there is a MONOPOLY on it which somehow cable companies are allowed to do WE DO NOT NEED THIS ON TOP OF IT!!!

The proposal in front of the FCC would allow Comcast, AT&T and other big telecom companies to decide who can benefit from fast Internet speed -- while slowing down, or even blocking, everyone else -- and making millions in profit from it! This would effectively deny equal access to free speech. Please reject this Anti- American idea.

Subject: Net Neutrality

Hello,

I am writing to state my strong concerns to the newly suggested plans by the FCC away from a neutral internet and toward one where internet service providers can, both positively and negatively, alter access to online content. Being a consumer with only one option of broadband internet, it is essential you require equal access to all content for me to have genuine freedom online.

As a consumer in New York, where my provider is proscribed by the building, I am particularly limited in choice and so am highly sensitive to the idea that my ISP could bias my access to the internet. Working as a scientific researcher who conducts extensive work (both in lab and at home) online and unfettered access is central to my success. And as a consumer I (should) have the right to choose the content providers who satisfy my needs, not those my ISP has agreed preferential terms with.

I already pay (Time Warner Cable in my case) for internet access, and in exchange for this money they should provide me internet access by maintaining and improving their connection to the larger internet. The idea that the same provider could then intentionally give me biased performance for non-technical reasons is repugnant. It encourages kickbacks to be a driving force in my provider's network decision, and limits my ability to choose the best content for myself.

I urge the commission to reject any sort of fast (or slow) lane proposals to internet provision. Further, ISPs should be categorized as common carriers to ensure they treat all traffic equally, allowing the consumers who paid for the access to choose what content they want.

Sincerely,
David Sauer, PhD

The U.S.A. Constitution's First Amendment establishes freedom of speech (presumably to "the people"); it does not have any provision for the federal government to sell that freedom to the highest bidder.

I am a freelance digital artist. I conduct my business entirely over the internet and because I work with large graphic files I need to have access to fast internet speed that can handle these files. Without that guarantee, my ability to continue supplying my clients with my services will be severely compromised. I don't appreciate having to pay extra to keep the same connections in order to continue working in this field.

Democracy thrives with a well informed public. Taking equity out of the internet endangers the health of our democracy by putting big tech companies at the control of access to fast internet speed at the expense of other smaller companies and the public. I urge the FCC members to reconsider today's ruling and vote to keep our internet free and open.

The internet should remain free and open. Right now, the proposal in front of the FCC would allow Comcast, AT&T and other big telecom companies to decide who can benefit from fast Internet speed -- while slowing down, or even blocking, everyone else. If you allow this, it will effectively remove all voices from the internet but those that already have a tremendous amount of power.

Too little information from too few independent sources is a mechanism used by dictatorships to keep societies closed and uninformed. Why should our Nation, which espouses freedom of thought, legalize such a mechanism that further diminishes it--namely permitting large telecom corporations to selectively block users thus weakening net neutrality?

The greed and scheming cowardice of telecom corporations like Verizon, Comcast and AT&T places democracy, both its spirit and its practice, in measurable peril--measurable in a loss of freedom and measurable in the profits these corporations seek to reap by imposing dictatorial controls on the internet.

Net Neutrality is a principle that says that Internet users, not ISPs, should be in control. It ensures that Internet service providers can't speed up, slow down, or block web content based on its source, ownership, or destination.

Net Neutrality is important because the Internet is an essential service Americans rely on to conduct our most basic daily affairs, from applying for a job to finding a home to running a small business. And our right to communicate freely and be heard lies at the heart of our ability to participate equally in our democracy.

The FCC has the authority to protect all Internet users by requiring Internet service providers like AT&T, Comcast and Verizon to continue to treat all web users equally.

A string of federal court cases has made it abundantly clear that the FCC has the power to enforce strong Net Neutrality rules if it goes through the process of undoing a terrible Bush-era decision to deregulate broadband instead of treating it like the vital public utility it has become.

But rather than take that clear (and clearly legal) path of re-regulating broadband as a public utility (in FCC jargon, "reclassifying" broadband), the FCC is proposing sham rules that sound like regulation but in reality will afford us no protection at all.

While the proposed rules are subject to change before they are finalized, it is both alarming and telling that the FCC's starting place is sham reform instead of meaningful protection for Net Neutrality.

We urge the FCC to recognize our nation's communications providers as "common carriers" under the law -- and abandon the plan to create a two-tier internet, with a fast lane for the 1% and a slow lane for everyone else.

C'mon guys. Big Telecom already has a choke hold on the internet. It makes no sense to give them even more power to dictate who and can do what. They have and will prioritize their profits over the good of society.

How about giving the power to prioritize data to the consumers? Allow us to choose whether or not streaming videos is more important the VOIP. Now that would be awesome.

To Chairman Tom Wheeler and the FCC Commissioners-----

To the FCC---

Please build any net neutrality argument upon solid legal standing. Specifically, this means reclassifying broadband under Title II of the Telecommunications Act of 1934.

706 authority from the Telecommunications Act has been repeatedly struck down in court after legal challenges by telecom companies. Take the appropriate steps to prevent this from happening again.

Sincerely,

Victoria Coursey

The Internet should be considered part of backbone, broadband communication system in the US and, as such, should be regulated with equal access for all. If the FCC allows some users to buy faster access, it can only be provided at the expense of others. This is not the equal access that our communication system in the US should provide for all.

Subject: Net Neutrality
Dear Commissioner,

I write to you worried about our current and future state of internet in the United States. The proposal that was voted on today, Thursday, about net neutrality includes options that could allow ISPs like Comcast to continue to discriminate against data coming to or from certain locations. If these circumstances are allowed to culminate, excessive tolls could severely limit the freedom on information or outright censor online resources.

The FCC needs to reclassify ISPs as a telecommunications service, specifically, a Title Two common carrier. This reclassification would allow for other forms of competition to enter into the internet market and promote companies to out perform one another through innovation. In contrast, the current ISP state promotes the exact opposite, using out-dated laws to secure their business and exploit consumers.

You are now in charge of this decision whether you voted for it or not. I hope that your decision on this matter will reflect the desires of the people of the United States as opposed to big business.

Respectfully,

Forrest Fleck - Fort Worth, Texas

To whom it may concern:

Stop it, please. We have no interest in being your piggy bank and letting you seize one of the now main things in our lives. We said no, we mean no, and we're not going to change our minds.

I understand you're a business but if you screw around with the internet, something 85% of people and up probably use, that is not benefiting the greater good. That's lining your already overstuffed pocket, if you kill net neutrality you're taking away

A chance for a struggling single parent to find that better job advert.

A chance for a bullied teen to find a safe haven among fellows who understand.

A chance for relatives that live very far away from each other to connect.

Yes there's a lot of 'sheep' for you to flock who can pay what you want. But there are even more who can't, and as a creative individual you killing Net Neutrality also effects me.

I can't afford to pay what you want, and you telling me what I can and can't create? Okay see how that goes, when in 10 years or so there's nothing for you to go see new on the theater, no new book to read.

Many artists and authors get their start by paying homage to something they love and sharing it, a lot of people get their own fanbase starting this way. Letting them branch into original work.

We need Net Neutrality. Kill it, and your shooting yourself in the foot and setting up for a lot of angry mobs. You're being sneaky, I haven't heard any news coverage, you think when this goes live people are just going to shrug and say 'meh'?

Yes fine some will, rich folks even upper middle class, like you who don't know anything about how hard it can be. But the rest of us? Oh we're going to get loud, and I don't care how many times you raise this zombie of a monstrosity from the grave. We're still going to say NO.

Please take the hint.
Thank you for your time.

To Whom this is Directed;

The question is if we allow internet service to stratify into differing levels of access, with better service paying a premium to suppliers, will service be expanded to accommodate all levels of access or will premium accounts simply gobble up a bigger share of existing service potential? Since the issue comes up due to a shortfall in potential service what will better prompt suppliers to increase service, premium accounts, or disgruntled customers of all levels if usage? I would tend to say the latter most clearly would, and so best serve consumers of all types of access.

Keep it open. Be leaders that earn respect. Restricting internet speed in the interest of profit and big business is unfair, un democratic and monopolizing. The benefits to unrestricted internet usage far outweigh the actions you propose.

To Chairman Tom Wheeler and the FCC Commissioners——

Allowing internet service providers to create internet “fast lanes” and “slow lanes” would do nothing more than allow them to extort payments from companies like Netflix. It’s time to admit that the internet is a public utility, not a private “service.”

DO NOT mess with our right to use the internet. It is our right to be able to access information without censorship. It would be a violation of all Americans first amendment rights to the freedom of speech and for people like me that attend Church online you would be violating our right to practice religion. Not to mention the fact that I as well as millions of other Americans use the internet to attend college. Do you really want to hinder Americans that are bettering themselves and trying to help America as a whole and to be able to compete better on the world market?

Subject: Open Internet (14-28)

The Honorable Thomas E. Wheeler, et al.

445 12th St, S.W.

Washington, D.C. 20554

May 15, 2014

Dear Chairman Wheeler, and Commissioners Clyburn, Rosenworcel, Pai, and O’Rielly:

I have been following with interest your ongoing proceeding on how best to re-implement the “net neutrality” rules.

Like you, I believe it is critical that we maintain a free and open Internet, where consumers are not blocked from accessing the websites of their choice and providers do not use their control over the last mile to stifle competition.

As you consider how best to move forward to achieve these goals, I write to share my concerns with reports that the Commission may not be considering achieving these goals by reclassifying broadband Internet access service as a “Title II” common carrier service. In recent years, after the initial build-out, that broadband service has been subjected to relatively little regulation. Investment, competition and deployment have dwindled and broadband consolidation and service rates have increased, all to the detriment of consumers and the American economy.

While we still have further to go to ensure that the benefits of broadband reach all Americans, I am convinced that opening the door to subjecting broadband service to some regulatory oversight, i.e, imposing Title II, is the only way to ensure this progress. I respectfully urge you to consider the effect that reclassifying to a Title II approach will have on private companies’ ability to exact extortionate fees from content providers and last mile customers. Their huge profit margins already ensure they have sufficient capital, and should be enough incentive, to continue to invest and innovate.

Consider as well, the potentially huge positive impact on job creation that might result from any new innovations or next-generation infrastructure investment. I share your goals of keeping the Internet open to all. I whole-heartedly believe that a Title II approach is the best means of achieving this goal for our country.

Thank you for your work on this very important issue.

Sincerely,
Jeff Carrick

The internet was the last place for people products and ideas to meet on relatively neutral ground and get a sense for the possibility of making better choices for themselves. In the end it became an opening for world growth and better understanding in all sectors.

What monster would want to control that for their personal benefit. This tips the scale and makes it not about a world markets but corporate markets. Too much power centralized is a no brainer wrong way forward!

Much like telephones, internet access is something almost all americans depend on. Therefore, it should be regulated as such and not like a luxury information service, but as the utility it is to tens of millions of american households. Reclassify ISPs as Title 2 and keep america competitive with the rest of the world.

To Chairman Tom Wheeler and the FCC Commissioners——

Allowing internet service providers to create internet “fast lanes” and “slow lanes” would do nothing more than allow them to extort payments from companies like Netflix. It’s time to admit that the internet is a public utility, not a private “service.”

Our government has given corporations personhood, blatant preferential treatment when it comes to almost everything, can you just leave the internet alone, it's fine the way it is. Verizon and AT&T do not NEED another money-making avenue, they're fine just the way they are, and so is net neutrality. Do the right thing and stop selling out like 99% government officials. #disgraceful

I wish to add my voice to the growing community of people who believe that net neutrality is a key aspect of our society. An open internet reflects the values of the people who created it, and has allowed a level of global communication that we could only dream about when I was a child. Letting telecom companies decide who receives faster internet speeds will cause lasting harm to the system as a whole

To Chairman Tom Wheeler and the FCC Commissioners—

The internet is central to American life and the modern economy. It makes no sense to regulate it as a private “service.” It is a public utility and should be treated as such.

Please declare the internet to be a public utility

To Chairman Tom Wheeler and the FCC Commissioners——

Title II of the Communications Act of 1934 already grants you the authority to declare the internet a public utility and provide greater regulation to the telecommunications industry. It's long past time to declare the internet a utility.

That is the democratic way and that was the basic principle on which this country was built and from which it has sadly strayed thanks to the 1 percent, and a Confess that bases it's

The Internet is an important part of modern day society, precisely because it is a place which anyone can access and speak through, and giving it over to corporations to divide up and deny access will have a huge, negative impact on the global society.

Let the internet remain open and free.

I am outraged by the actions of the FCC in regards to the net neutrality issue.

"One year from now, we have the chance to tell all those corporate lobbyists that the days of them setting the agenda in Washington are over. I have done more to take on lobbyists than any other candidate in this race – and I've won. I don't take a dime of their money, and when I am President, they won't find a job in my White House." (Sen. Barack Obama, Remarks At A Campaign Event, Spartanburg, SC, 11/3/07)

Yet what are we seeing? A lobbyist in the chairman seat. America has already fallen behind many countries in terms of internet speed, and the FCC's plan will simply make it worse.

Reclassify broadband services as telecommunication title II services! I do not want ISPs to force certain hand picked companies to pay more.

Thank you.

Fast internet should not be reserved for the rich! The internet is not, and should not be, controlled by the wishes of the masses nor of large corporations. I might want to hear the voice of a tiny group in Ethiopia - why should Time Warner be able to decide if that voice can be drowned out by "bigger" voices? I don't think this has been well thought out and you should not push it through, because by doing so, you may tape shut important voices, as well as hold back the education and development of our nation's poor.

Sincerely,

Heidi

They want to destroy the openness of the internet the way they did the public airwaves just for their own profits. The commission needs to decide this issue for the people and not the corporations of the 1 %.

Internet access isn't a luxury that can be given solely to the rich who help to line the pockets of providers' CEOs. It's a necessity for the workforce, for students, and for the social structure of the United States. To remove this tool from individuals and organizations simply because they can't pay the exorbitant prices demanded by the providers (who have no need for additional income) would shatter our already fragile economy, and to allow those providers to slow and even stop the loading of pages - especially political pages - whose content they don't like is inherently un-American. This proposal would give telecom giants like AT&T and Comcast the power to launch some political campaigns and movements while crushing others at the whims of their executives. That is not government by the people, for the people; that is government by the corporations, over the people, regardless of what the people want or need.

Classify ISPs as common carriers, and challenge their recent not-so-veiled threats to cut back on service or impose low data caps as corporate blackmail. Don't allow them to give preference to their own VOIP and video streaming services over third parties such as Netflix or Vonage. They've received government subsidy for years to ostensibly build out service, WHERE IS IT?

Leave the net alone! It was created for us all to use freely with no restriction. It's bad enough we have to pay such high fees to corporations to even connect, but don't add insult to injury. Leave it alone! The telecom companies make more than is fair for their services. They should not be allowed to decide who has connectivity. FCC——

The 21st century internet is an integral part of our economy, democracy, and communication systems. America is absolutely dependent on an open internet operating on net neutrality principles.

As such, you have an obligation to regulate it as a utility. Please assert your Title II authority, and stop trying to appease the telecom giants at the expense of everyone else.

Thank you,

I firmly believe that the worst thing that can possibly happen is for the Internet to be changed from what it is today as in the long run I believe that only the wealthy would be able to afford the Internet which to me would be a crime, a shameful thing!

I personally use the Internet to help people, often times looking up information which may be able to help the Handicapped and the Seniors of our time.

I also often times help some people who are either Suicidal or claim to be via the Internet.

Of course I do use the email quite often which is needless to say.

If the prices are raised for Internet many people will not be able to afford having the Internet, I am one of them! If many people cannot afford the Internet then that will also cause many businesses to lose business and which way to you think those businesses will turn to blame? YOU! Nearly every chain, every large business such as Wal Mart, Kmart, Amazon, Sears, even the fast food industry uses the Internet for either sales or advertising so if the lose business meaning income from their advertising or sales they are going to blame you so that is something to seriously consider before making those changers you people are thinking about making!

Subject: The internet is central to American life and the economy

To Chairman Tom Wheeler and the FCC Commissioners——

Allowing internet service providers to create internet “fast lanes” and “slow lanes” would do nothing more than allow them to extort payments from companies like Netflix. It’s time to admit that the internet is a public utility, not a private “service.”

Lack of internet access puts many people at a disadvantage, and creates a stratified society. If internet access is required to pay taxes to the IRS and state, to get and maintain a drivers license or photo identification, the steps must be taken to insure that everyone has equal access to that resource. Putting those who cannot pay into a lower tier of service will effectively block access to this required resource for many. If the nature of the changes means that some requests may simply time out repeatedly with no guarantee that the transaction will complete eventually, is the same thing as denial of access. Please take steps to insure that fair and reliable access to the internet is available to everyone.

Subject: Comcast merger with Time Warner: strongly oppose

Comcast is the worst company for service nationwide I have dealt with. I have struggled with Comcast in Florida and in Washington state. They are too big already and cannot coordinate between different sections of the same company, and cannot provide adequate service. It takes hours to days on hold on the phone or waiting at home for them to get anything done, and often they miss their appointments or send people who don't know how to do the work they've contracted to do so I've had to wait at home all day again and again to get basic service repairs or maintenance.

If anything Comcast should be broken up into smaller more responsive companies.

I would also like to receive only the channels I actually look at and stop paying for ESPN.

Subject: Net Neutrality is the Soul of the Internet, Kill it and you effectively kill one of mankind's greatest tools.
Propose Title II, and Regulate them as a common carrier.
To whom it may concern,

I feel your putting too much faith in a corporate entity to do the right thing. Unfortunately corporations are legally obligated to make a profit for their investors. This puts the investors' interest in direct conflict with that of the consumer. And if history has taught us anything, corporations will continue to find ways to offer less and tell us its more. This whole vote is making me sick, and I'm hoping to god you come to your senses and don't let your lobbyist background dictate what you know in your heart is a sham deal for the consumer. I pay for 50 mb a month connection and Netflix, and because of rulings like this the cost of NetFlix paying for fast lanes is going to be passed directly to the consumer. Where's the justice in that? Being double billed for a service I already pay for? A service that Comcast doesn't even guarantee, I may pay for 50 mb/sec but I rarely do I see it. Perhaps you should mention that fact to the cable companies before you give them carte blanche on creating a divided internet.

Enforce Title II and let the market work out the rest. Why is it in a country that created the internet, I have one of the slowest and most costly connections to the internet?

Thank You

Subject: Gain Organic Traffic: mademan.com :PS

Dear mademan.com Team,

I thought you might like to know some of the reasons why you are not getting enough Organic search engine and Social Media traffic for mademan.com.

1. Your website mademan.com is not ranking top in Google organic search for many competitive keywords.
2. Your website profile needs to have regular update in major Social Media sites.
3. Your site has less number of Google & Yahoo back links, this can be improved further.

There are many additional improvements that could be made to your website, and if you would like to learn about them, and are curious to know what our working together would involve, then I would be glad to provide you with a detailed analysis in the form of a WEBSITE AUDIT REPORT for FREE.

Our clients consistently tell us that their customers find them because they are at the top of the Google search rankings. Being at the top left of Google (#1- #3 organic positions) is the best thing you can do for your company's website traffic and online reputation.

Our packages are designed for a complete advance SEO experience which includes SMO, Brand management, Reputation management, SEO etc. in order to beat your competitors.

Sounds interesting? Feel free to email us.

This is so ridiculous... Here I am again. An American citizen once again demanding the "Toothless" FCC do the bidding of "WE THE PEOPLE", NOT huge mega-corps who's greed, obfuscation, and self-serving interests will destroy the livelihoods of people like me. If the open internet is merely an information service instead of a 'telecommunications' service, then how do we justify our fears that our National Security at risk when foreign agents attempt to harm us. If this goes forward, I will leave the U.S. where my work product(s) aren't relegated to a 3rd 'tier' slow lane.

Your proposed path would open the door to widespread discrimination online. It would give Internet service providers the green light to implement pay-for-priority schemes that would be a disaster for start-ups, nonprofits and everyday Internet users who cannot afford these unnecessary tolls.

I urge you to scrap these proposed rules and instead restore the principle of online nondiscrimination by reclassifying broadband as a telecommunications service.

Dear Mr. Wheeler,

Respectfully, I urge you to keep the Internet a level playing field for all Americans. Allowing corporations to pick and choose what Internet traffic will travel unencumbered puts the average American citizen at a major disadvantage. The higher prices that services like Netflix will be forced to pay to deliver their content will unquestionably be passed on to the consumer, and giant corporations like Comcast will wield far too much power over this public infrastructure. The Internet should remain accessible at the highest speeds that the technology will allow to ALL the people, not just the well-off who can afford to pay more for streamlined access.

As a society, we are already suffering from the Supreme Court's misguided decision on Citizens United v. the Federal Election Commission, where giant corporate money rules all and drowns out the average, ordinary citizen. Please do not allow Net Neutrality to be the next big failure for the American people.

I thank you for your time.

Please build any net neutrality argument upon solid legal standing. Specifically, this means reclassifying broadband under Title II of the Telecommunications Act of 1934.

706 authority from the Telecommunications Act has been repeatedly struck down in court after legal challenges by telecom companies. Take the appropriate steps to prevent this from happening again.

I do not understand how a "Fast Lane" for some is not the same as a "Slow Lane" for every one else. There is obviously finite capacity, and this system creates incentives to divide it unfairly.

To Chairman Tom Wheeler and the FCC Commissioners——

To the FCC——

Please build any net neutrality argument upon solid legal standing. Specifically, this means reclassifying broadband under Title II of the Telecommunications Act of 1934.

Dear Mr. Tom Wheeler, Chairman at the Federal Communications Commission

I am writing this letter to protest the recent decision of the case, Verizon Communications Inc. vs Federal Communications Commission, which will allow companies like Verizon and Comcast to build special lanes for costumers who pay more internet services.

I truly think this is a bad idea. The internet is one of the biggest tool in the world in which can use to better our lives. If we allow internet service companies to create lanes for better service while charging a ridiculously amount will be a disastrous decision, leaving many without the choice of cancelling their internet due to the high price.

Please take into consideration the effects it will have on the local population if the net neutrality was to disappear.

Sincerely,

A concerned citizen

This is terrible that the FCC and federal government are allowing this to happen to the internet. Bandwidth should all be treated equally and there should not be a priority to companies that pay. You are crushing the start ups and not allowing a fair playing field. The FCC is playing to big business and not fighting for the consumer. I pay a very high cost already for internet from Comcast and not only do they cap my usage but they penalize me for using streaming services that are not owned by Comcast. When large companies like Netflix pay for these fast lanes they not only squash smaller competitors but they pass those costs on to consumers. You are destroying the internet as we know it. Please allow the internet to remain neutral with all traffic being treated equally. No prioritized traffic or fast lanes.

Your proposed path would open the door to widespread discrimination online. It would give Internet service providers the green light to implement pay-for-priority schemes that would be a disaster for startups, nonprofits and everyday Internet users who cannot afford these unnecessary tolls.

I urge you to scrap these proposed rules and instead restore the principle of online nondiscrimination by reclassifying broadband as a telecommunications service.

Not only is it a violation of every citizen's right to equal access to information, it could be a huge problem for democracy by making some sources of information more accessible than others, and it would also deal a huge blow to the nation's intellectual growth, by limiting said access to information.

I am urging your office to classify the internet as a public utility. Over and over, we hear that the internet is imperative and access is the key. By allowing Comcast to run rampant (the Time Warner merger, implementing data caps for every customer within 5 years, the Netflix fiasco, and honestly, their poor customer service in that they decide what apps we are allowed to run on devices that we own already) you are creating a mockery of the notion that the government is for the people. Every decision you have made seems to be for the telecoms and it is unfathomable to me that you continue to try to paint this as a benefit for the public. Comcast posted a $1.9 profit in the first quarter of 2014! They are not the ones who need more government help.

If you continue on this path, the US will fall further behind. I am imploring you to make the correct decision for the public. We need the internet to remain an open avenue for us all. Please do not allow it to become a commodity at the time when so much relies on it. Fast lanes are not the answer. What does this even mean? How can you say there can be fast lanes but ignore the obvious slow(er) lanes? We already pay a small fortune for internet access. You have to realize that charging the other companies that we do business with will only mean more costs for the customer. We will essentially be paying twice.

I will be following this issue. I realize the FCC chairman's background is with the telecom companies he is now in charge of regulating. It was a poor decision by our president but we are stuck now. At least prove us wrong and make the right decisions now.

Thank you,

How is it fair that I can only choose between two providers for something so critical?

Instead of allowing them to charge content providers or have “fast lanes”, you should be opening up the hardware lines (from which Comcast and Century Link provide service) to other providers.

Your lack of allowing fair market competition and giving more power to the few providers of broadband echoes COMMUNISM.

Subject: FCC's Net Neutrality rules
Commissioner Wheeler,

I write to you to express dismay and alarm at the proposed rules regarding internet "fast lanes." These ultimately are an abandonment of the principal of "Net Neutrality," cloaked in the guise of better service for some. Better for some, in the absence of expanded investment for all, means worse service for others, namely the smaller firms who cannot afford to pay up to Comcast and the rest. I urge you to reject this line of regulation, as it may do untold harm to the internet and the economy more broadly.

Additionally, I urge you to embrace a net neutrality approach that does not stop at the "last mile" of internet access, but rather one more holistic in approach. A half-hearted approach to net neutrality such as this would create a glaring end-run around net neutrality, as seen by Comcast's brazen hostage-taking of Netflix (by throttling its streaming speeds) unless it agreed to pay extra fees. In the end this gap in regulation would also spell the end of net neutrality and would also deal a blow to consumers across the country.

We need an even playing field for all websites, not a stratified internet of "haves" and "have nots." Thank you for your consideration. Best,

Noah Metz

Subject: Net neutrality

This message is in response to your flagrant attempt to destroy the internet as we know it for the sake of putting more money in corporate pockets. The internet is arguably the greatest invention by mankind with some of the most profound changes to our civilization. It has become the backbone of our economy and become so deeply embedded in our society that the UN has declared it a "basic human right". If the internet were to "go down", for a week, a month, or any period of time really, mass chaos would ensue, and that is no hyperbole.

That is the internet. And it has become apparent that it is the opinion of the FCC, and its former-lobbyist-of-the-industry-he's-now-charged-with-regulating chairman, that the monopolistic corporations who provide the physical infrastructure on which the people access this backbone of our civilization should have the ability to structure the internet--to their own benefit--into a tiered system that creates different classes of internet users, in effect crushing the ability of small start-ups to succeed by not being able to "pay up" (this is sounding mafia-esque), and consolidates internet traffic to the big corporate sites favored by the very ISPs who set the tiers. Not to mention the fact that when a consumer is unhappy with the new tiered services their ISP provides, more than likely they have no viable alternative. No room for Free Market competition in the internet industry, right?

It is utterly shameful that a government agency tasked with regulating the internet feels that this dark road is the path we should take it down in the 21st century. The internet works best for society as the open internet that it currently is, and the corporations whose infrastructure the people use to access it are already privileged enough to make money hand over fist from it. It is farcical to suggest that allowing the ISPs to carve up the internet with tiers is somehow necessary and benefits anyone but these corporations. Allowing the ISPs to do this will have the effect of stifling growth and innovation, not cultivating it. People paying more as time goes on for a devolving technology does not strike me as a particularly American way of running an industry. Then again, maybe I'm wrong. Your move, FCC. History will judge you.

Free radio has been destroyed by allowing it to be controlled by a handful of huge corporations, and now you want to do the same to the Internet. Which, by the way, we all pay plenty for already.

Your job is to safeguard the only truly democratic media left to us, not pave the way for corporate domination of the Internet. Net neutrality has changed the world. Anything less means that our communications will be controlled even more than they are already by big business.

For the sake of the people and in the name of national progression, please reclassify ISPs as common carriers. I know it may be very scary and controversial, as the leader of your organization is a shill for companies like Comcast, but it would be easier for all parties involved if we the people did not have to take to the street and riot in order to force reform upon you. Unfortunately as time goes on it appears more and more clear that the corruption does indeed run deep, and that slow speeds, data caps, selective speeds for content providers, a complete rejection of net neutrality, and a fragmentation of internet based business and the internet as a whole depending on wealth will become standard things in the future. The only way to prevent the complete dissolution of the internet as we know it is if we take immediate action and reclassify ISPs common carriers.

Hi, I'd like this opportunity to voice both some concern as well as some suggestions regarding

Let me first start by saying the general overarching principle that I am leading with is the notion that the Internet should not be under direct governance by any regulatory body. It is my belief that keeping the internet free flowing and not imposing any man-made "dams" along the way is the only way to preserve the culture and importance of this resource.

To start, the general premise that this plan is constructed on is flawed. In section I.3 and I.4 have contradictory goals. In I.3, the general principle expressed is the same as mine. The internet is open and free from interference once you connect to it. However, in I.4 it is because those who are the gateways to the internet (in this case, Internet Service Providers), have previously tried throttling internet traffic based on protocol and/or based on the content provider, that it becomes necessary to create a set of regulations that govern the quality of service that a consumer can expect to have. Once we go down this road, it means that companies will find ways to get around the legal letter of the law to further monetize their networks.

More regulations are not the answer to this problem. More interference is not the answer to this problem. What we need is a common sense and simple set of guidelines that hook into existing legislation. The fact that it is internet traffic shouldn't make any difference than if we were talking about any other business transaction. For example, if I run a brick and mortar store and I decide that I need special lighting, I contract with the power company to provide a service for an agreed upon rate. Where that power comes from or how it is used is irrelevant. A kW is a kW is a kW. If I use more, I get charged more. The power company shouldn't care if I'm powering lights, or servers, or air conditioners or a pin-ball machine. If I have a party and use a lot of kW, I get charged more on my bill. The same view should be with internet traffic. Doesn't matter what the type of traffic is, a packet is a packet is a packet. I as a consumer contract with my ISP to provide a certain level of service. In my case, that is unlimited data with 50Mbps downstream and 10Mbps upstream. I pay for this at a rate of $120/monthly. If I wasn't on an unlimited plan, then I would expect to pay more for any overage to the volume of packets (data) that I consume in a given month. But this isn't a one-sided relationship. While I can connect to the internet, in order to make use of that connection, content providers such as Netflix are out there serving out content to people like me. They too pay for internet services from an ISP or provider and are charge similar rates for their service. The more packets they send, the higher they are charged. This is where the industry has to come to some realization that times are changing.

As an example of that change, I go back a few years when the internet didn't have streaming movies. At that time, a 3-4Mb MP3 was a large file and depending on your service, whether be DSL, or ISDN, or T1 or Dial-up, it would take anywhere from minutes to hours to complete that transaction. With speeds exploding on both ends, where content providers can push content at tremendous Gbps and consumers can receive content on average at 5-15Mbps, the conversation has changed. It means at any point in time, there is a more constant flow or weight on an ISP's network because instead of individual large files being transferred, you now have a stream of content constantly being transmitted on that network. Where in the past, an ISP could bank on the fact that the network usage has peaks and valleys and the majority of time nothing is being used off that network, today's reality is very much different as at any point in time a consumer could have streaming video, streaming audio, online gaming, work related VPN, emails, web traffic, mobile traffic, etc. So now instead of valleys and peaks, it is a flat and constant rate of traffic being exerted on an ISP's network.

Because of this, ISP's have to bolster their network to handle that constant and growing load. They have to use new features and technology to optimize packets and route more efficiently across their networks. But the reality is eventually those networks are going to be saturated and cannot handle any more traffic. It is this limit that ISP's such as Verizon and Comcast are fighting against as it would mean a significant investment in new wiring and hardware to constantly keep up with the demands of consumers and businesses on internet traffic. It is this limit that forces ISP's to evaluate where they can fund further expansion but also how to deepen their profits. In a utopian business model, if an ISP were to take their net costs and subtract that from their net revenue and invest back into the business their profits, it would mean they could keep up with the growing demands with smaller but on-going upgrades to infrastructure and man-power. But because businesses are in business to make profit instead of spending it, it means that all of this differed maintenance requires a much larger investment when the network reaches its maximum limit.

At the core of this though, traffic is traffic and ISP's should charge their subscribers based on the demands that they have. If they have an agreement with a consumer for unlimited traffic, then that should fall under deceptive practices if they throttle or limit or control how that traffic is used by the consumer. If however, they start to impose caps which many ISP's have done so in recent years, then it is the general expectation of the consumer that you have a finite amount of traffic that you can use per month and anything more you have to pay more. Similarly content providers such as Netflix negotiate similar agreements with their ISP's to handle their traffic needs based on the volume they expect to serve.

To break this all down, let's assume that a company like Comcast has 100 end-consumers. Those consumers each are on a plan that affords them 100Gb of total traffic each month and that service is being delivered at a rate of 10Mbps downstream and 5Mbps upstream. It should be the expectation of Comcast that at any given time it must be able to handle 1000Mbps of combined traffic on their network if every consumer maxed out their downstream connection at the same time. This is the same principle that banks and financial institutions have where they have to be able to have enough liquidity that if all their customer's came in to withdraw monies from their account at the same time, a financial institution has to have the available funds to be able to service those customers.

Where the content is coming from is irrelevant. What type of content is irrelevant. So as long as the consumer is within the pre-agreed upon parameters of their service, then it is up to the ISP to gauge at what point they need to reinvest in order to keep up with their subscriber base. If it becomes too costly for them to keep up, then they have to change their plans to reflect true market costs to provide the agreed upon service. I suggest that the key indicators that should be measured and how the cost of service should be based on are:

Total Volume (downstream+upstream) of Traffic in Mb per month,

Maximum downstream speed,

Average sustained downstream speed,

Maximum upstream speed,

Average sustained upstream speed,

Quality of Service measured in packet loss

Price Per Mb

This would be no different to how a power company reads your meter each month and bills you according to usage. It doesn't care how much you use, but if you start pulling down a lot of kW, expect to pay that at the end of the month with a huge bill! That goes for both consumers as well as content providers like Netflix. But if ISP's do not plan and divide their capacity in meaningful ways and continue to provide unlimited services and keep getting close to hitting their glass ceiling, then it should

How can you not see that if ISPs begin to offer fast lanes, they will never upgrade their connections for non-payers and will eventually force all business to pay to get even decent speeds. In this case ISPs are double dipping. Customers are paying Comcast for speeds of "up to 50mps" and then Netflix and other providers will pay them again to guarantee those speeds. The ISPs are double dipping and you are allowing it! Worse off, the customers are the ones who end up paying that extra fee anyway as we can see companies like netflix announcing a price increase after they were forced to make a deal with Comcast. And this doesn't just affect customers of the greedy ISPs but everyone since Netflix is raising prices all around! You are literally damning future startups and our country's innovation engine. This decision is going to turn the internet into cable TV. Overturn this decision and make ISPs a common carrier or I and the rest of this country will ensure Tom Wheeler and the members of the commission ruining the internet are all removed and shamed.

Do not go forward with the proposed "special, faster lanes" for online content. Have you considered what this will do to small businesses? By doing this you will unfairly discriminate against companies that could not or are unwilling to pay.

And this will hurt consumers and companies alike. The United States used to stand for equality and democracy. That is slowly eroding away. Please do not constrain the internet in the same way.

Thank you for opening the floor for public comments. But not for the draft rules you have put forward! The so-called "open internet" you talk about is anything but open. In fact it is a betrayal of the principle of equal access.

It is your job to protect the public interest in the domain of communications; and I want you to do that job. That means acting to protect democratic media. It means stopping with the transparent "smokescreens" for corporate domination of the Internet. The internet is the new commons. It is a space in which citizens meet and interact in varieties of ways. Do the right thing and declare the internet what it is: a public utility. The "Pay for play" two track system that giant ISP's are seeking will destroy equal access to a free and open internet. Libraries and universities will suffer. Small content providers will be squeezed out. And the large corporate interests will win, one more time.

Don't go there!

The public already views internet service in the same way we view other utilities, such as electricity or phone service. We pay our fees and expect to use the service as we like. Giving ISPs control over content will lead to an erosion of free speech and a crushing of smaller competition. They claim they would be forced to "spend less on network upgrades and be less innovative" yet we have seen little innovation from them under the current system, in which they carve out monopolies for themselves.

I haven't had a choice in internet providers in decades. I've lived in several states during that time, and always had a single choice for internet in my area. Everything they claim will happen under common carrier status is happening NOW. Customers are at the mercy of their ISP, and have no alternatives as startups are quickly crushed by regulation or lawsuit.

The corporations already hold too much power over the internet. The last thing we need here is for them to be given even more.

Dear FCC,

I find your proposals announced today to potentially undo net neutrality appalling, wholly un-American and thoroughly anti-consumer. You are in fact bolstering monopolies and allowing them to reap even greater profits with no clear benefit in these rules to anyone but the ISPs.

The basic fact that you are missing here is that ISP CUSTOMERS ALREADY PAY THEM FOR ACCESS TO THE INTERNET TO THE TUNE OF BILLIONS PER YEAR. Anything implemented that allows ISPs to subvert their responsibilities to their paying customers is at its core unethical any way you cut it.

Customers choose and pay for a broadband plan with a stated connection speed. We deserve to receive that connection to any site we choose to visit and it is the ISPs responsibility to deliver that. Believing that the ISPs could be regulated effectively to not deliver slower connection speeds is fantasy and you know it!

At the end of the day, any fees charged to internet companies for Fast Lane access will inevitably flow back to consumers and only serve to line the pockets of the already highly profitable ISPs.

As with most things in Washington these days your proposed rules are Customers Last; Rich Corporations and Lobbyists first. Please shock us and do something different.

Internet service providers are public utilities and you should classify, and regulate, them as such. We need to preserve what remains of a democratic media, and that's little enough listening to the Comcast-controlled NBC news spin on this issue this morning. We do not need to hear your platitudes, and it certainly is not in the public interest that corporations be given so much latitude to dominate the internet as well as much of the rest of big media. Hello,

I want to express my support for net neutrality, defined as an open network in which providers and proprietors of internet connectivity are expressly forbidden and prohibited from any action which would prioritize ANY form of Internet traffic over another.

Any other definition is NOT net neutrality.

I am a software developer and my career and livelihood will be directly affected by any FCC decisions to allow Internet companies to affect Internet connectivity in any way. Consider if a water company was allowed to send cleaner water to customers who pay more. This would never be allowed, and in the very same way neither should traffic prioritization.

The quality and state of the Internet in the United States today is far behind nearly all other developed countries and will continue its decline relative to other first-world countries if you allow a policy to take place in which Internet companies and content providers are allowed to strike deals with one another to gain a market advantage.

This is ridiculous. Comcast and Verizon don't own the internet, they own some fiber optics and they already charge users exorbitant fees to use said pipelines. They don't own the servers that host every website, they don't own the businesses, art, ideas, and free speech that reside on those sites. This is, in essence, allowing them to double dip. It's unconscionable to allow this to go through, and will radically change the internet and the way it works. It will, in essence, transfer ownership of the internet to these huge corporations. Don't allow this to happen, reclassify the internet as a telecommunications service.

I am in utter shock that you would allow this to move forward. You are only thinking about the corporations that stand to make more money from consumers. Who do you think is going to pay for "faster internet"? WE ARE!! The consumers are. These ISP stand to make so much more money. How is this in any way fair to us? There needs to be a change in the way ISP work. Please continue to consider ISP as a utility.

I'm writing to express my opposition to the tiered Internet speed proposal. Charging higher fees based on speed is a terrible idea with benefits only to the internet providers. America already has higher fees, slower speeds, and less access to high speed internet than other developed countries. This will only further limit useful internet access. If anything, providers should be required to provide greater access to high speed internet for everyone since they rely on public infrastructure to earn their profits. The public already subsidizes these companies & we should not have to pay additionally to get what they already should be providing if these companies actually had to compete with each other. Imagine the advantages to this country & the increases to our economic potential with low cost, widely available, high speed internet access. This proposal will only delay this process even longer.

The Internet is the People's product, originally created by the military, using taxpayer contributions. It has become one of America's chief economic engines for small business creation and continuing operations; to impose user fees on the Internet for access to faster service will further tilt the playing field toward the wealthy, exacerbating an already-explosive economic imbalance. The remedy is simple: reclassify the Internet as a communications medium, requiring equal access for all users. Do NOT continue to weaken and destroy the American middle class!

To: Chairman Wheeler and the rest of the Federal Communications Commission,

Thanks for confirming where the FCC really stands - firmly in the corner of the corporations. It's startling to see how little power the individual citizen has in the United States today, even after the clear and overwhelming outpouring of public opposition to this plan. In light of your clear disregard for the public's clearly expressed desires, I've given up on the hope of being governed by anything other than the interests of corporations (which, legally, are now people).

Despite my lack of faith, I will nonetheless petition you once more to match your nice words with real action and remove any allowance of fast lanes or paid prioritization from your proposal. Including those ignores the core meaning of Net Neutrality that all bits are equal, and it is an insult to call something "net neutrality" that allows them.

You've mentioned that Title II is an option, and given the alternatives you've provided, that looks like the best option. Please block any possibility of paid fast lanes which would cripple innovation in an already stifled, anti-competitive environment. If you can't draft a proposal that accomplishes this, use Title II.

Dear Chairman Wheeler and the Federal Communications Commission:

ISPs should not be in a position to choose which services are "allowed" over the internet any more than a telephone company should be able to choose who can place a call to whom.

Apparently, the currently drafted rules would in fact allow just that, and it would destroy the internet as we know it, as an open forum for communication and commerce. The internet is not like cable television. It is a two-way communication medium and must be kept open and free as such.

Please amend the proposed rules to preserve true net neutrality.

US Net Neutrality v EU Net Neutrality

I am firmly against any changes to net neutrality which will have any impact related to with fess to content providers, as it opens Pandora's box for future abuses. It is the ISP who must maintain adequate backbone to provide optimal services, as we as consumers are being charged outrageous fees internet service compared to our EU counterparts.

The public has less than 120 days to voice concerns over Mr Wheeler's recommended changes to Net Neutrality rules.

The proposed changes will in effect will allow charging providers for (priority) access, throttling, and/or blockage of internet services, as well as additional charges to customers.

The industry is, without question, threatened by IPTV, VoIP, etc...

The EU in April 2014, not only forbades such behavior, they also mandated cell phone carriers to reduce carriers fees and end roaming charges w/in the EU, while mandating all chargers must be the same in respect to connections for charging devices, etc.

Thomas E Wheeler, the present chair of the FCC, was a lobbyist for countless years for the industry, and was recently appointed to the FCC chairmanship on November 2013 by President Obama. Why was he nominated? Wheeler raised over $500,000 for Obama's reelection campaign.

Wheeler's posturing and history should recuse himself with regard to voting and/or mandating changes to net neutrality.

Greetings,

I am writing in response to today's decision.

I believe that any regulation that allows some people to pay for faster internet access to consumers is a serious blow to the idea of equal opportunity that our country is supposedly founded on. Please do not make this issue yet another instance where powerful business interests win out over the common man. Please ensure that everyone has the same access and opportunity on the internet, without any caveats.

Subject: please vote against internet fast lanes and classify internet access as a utility
I strongly believe that giving ISPs the power to charge companies more for premium bandwidth lanes will result in a) unfair advantages to big companies who can easily afford to do so over small/new companies, and b) allowing ISPs to further exploit the monopolies they already have in many geographical regions. Please note that many ISPs have deep connections to other businesses to which they may have incentive to give favorable rates, which invites all kinds of nepotism and preferential treatment, stifling the beneficial effects of the free market and competition.

If ISPs are worried that some customers consume all of their bandwidth, they can simply charge customers for their usage, like utility companies do. Maybe we can have fewer people spending days on end watching Netflix. Regardless, given their current near or total monopolies in many areas, ISPs should not give preferential treatments to businesses.

Please vote against preferential lanes; keep the internet open.

As someone who has made his living helping businesses and individuals utilize the internet to the fullest, I'm appalled that we are at this precipice where we may give large corporations the power to control access to the web in any way. The control must always reside with a fair and neutral party - not with those whose only concern is for maximizing profit.

While the monetary system is becoming little more than a poorly done hack, stunting the very technology we have to move out of our current monetary system mind locked bubble is not going to benefit anybody, from the super rich to the super poor all suffer at the end of the day/year/decade/century when it comes to us as a species(the human race).... and if you have kids this should concern you even more as we move into a inter planetary civilization we must strive to become a healthy one that can let go of the archaic bad principles we cling to like a religion now... namely the notion "its morally right if its profitable to me" fallacy as you are nothing outside the context of your environment.

Please have guts to use your power to help move into a system where it's no longer is relevant... such a place would be far better than the one you or I are living in today and is the world I would like to help paint... please do the same for yourself, your children and humanity as a whole.

I am dismayed to find that you intend to press on with your plans to abandon network neutrality as a requirement.

As a consumer, and a computer professional, my considered opinion is that nothing short of treating internet service providers as common carriers will protect the open internet that has revolutionized communications and commerce.

Instead of trying to patch around the courts' disapproval of your regulations, please move boldly to reclassify internet service providers.

Dear Messrs:

The discussion on Net Neutrality has moved away from what consumers actually want and need almost entirely into the political realm. What we need in our Internet infrastructure is not necessarily what some call a fast lane or a slow lane, but an efficient allocation of resources, so that all applications appear seamlessly to the end user. Absent convincing evidence of a market failure or demonstrable consumer harm, network management should remain a free-market contract negotiation of sorts, and not end up looking like government controlled phone service infrastructure or of broadcast/cable content regulation.

For the past decade, activists with a political agenda have pushed the increasingly outlandish conspiracy theory that in the absence of immediate and pervasive federal regulation broadband Internet will be destroyed by the companies supplying it. Unfortunately, the FCC appears to be bending to such pressure to rush through yet another iteration of complex, unnecessary and legally questionable net neutrality rule making. We therefore respectfully call on Congress to assert its authority concerning the FCC's role, and ask the FCC to await further action from Congress.

In Verizon the D.C. Circuit Court interpreted Section 706 of the 1996 Communications Act so as to give the agency authority to adopt new net neutrality rules, as long as these rules do not impose common carrier obligations on ISPs. The court's ruling may even provide the FCC with new powers to regulate Internet services beyond broadband infrastructure, such as "edge providers." The only real limit is that the FCC can't overtly treat Internet services as common carriers. But this limit may mean little.

Importantly, section 706 was not intended by Congress to constitute an independent grant of affirmative regulatory authority. This was the Commission's own understanding of Section 706 as well until the agency switched its view after its first foray into net neutrality regulation met with defeat in Comcast Corp. v. FCC.

Additionally, the court merely held the no-blocking and no-discrimination net neutrality rules unlawful; the court did not purport to define the boundaries of the Commission's Section 706 authority or adjudicate any particular exercises of such authority. The court did not require the agency to adopt any new regulations. Under all the circumstances - and especially the circumstance that there is no evidence of a present market failure or consumer harm resulting from Internet provider practices - there is no reason for the Commission to move forward at this time to adopt new net neutrality or net neutrality-like rules.

While some call for the FCC to use the "nuclear option" of Title II, we again urge Congress to clarify its intent with regards to the FCC's regulatory authority and for the FCC to wait for that direction from Congress.

The primary problem with Title II regulation of the competitive broadband industry is that it would abruptly decelerate the speed of Internet innovation to the speed of government - a regulatory regime that is as slow as the slowest part of the FCC's filing and public comment process.

Title II of the Communications Act is meant to deal with government-granted, government-regulated monopolies. The old bargain for what were once thought to be "natural monopolies" was that in order to encourage large, capital-intensive investments in utilities such as water, electric, or old-fashioned telephone infrastructure, government would grant a monopoly to a single provider who agreed to build very expensive infrastructure. Once built, these government-protected, government-regulated monopolies would be granted a guaranteed "rate of return" on their investments, but be forbidden from charging their customers monopoly prices.

The FCC definitively moved the Internet away from Title II regulations in 1998, when Clinton-appointed FCC Chairman William Kennard rejected the same Title II arguments being made today in that year's report to Congress:

"Classifying Internet access services as telecommunications services could have significant consequences for the global development of the Internet. We recognize the unique qualities of the Internet, and do not presume that legacy regulatory frameworks are appropriately applied to it."

While the expansion of 706 authority would likely affect edge providers, Title II reclassification would likely apply to all aspects of transmission via Internet. Any business providing over-the-top services, including search, voice, video and email, would likely come under Title II regulation - a dramatic expansion of restrictive regulation. We do not believe the FCC's "forbearance" authority would be efficient for determining the applicability of provisions of Title II to all of these services. This uncertainty would embroil the industry and the FCC in a slew of legal battles, and volatile market uncertainty that would dramatically harm infrastructure investment and capital expenditures.

In consideration of the vibrant Internet market of both service providers and over-the-top services, we submit that no market failure or real harm to consumers has been adequately demonstrated to support any expansion of FCC authority over the Internet. We urge Congress to act expeditiously in expressing its understanding of the proper role of the FCC in regard to regulating the Internet, and urge the FCC to wait for Congressional direction.

I urge our Congress to keep the internet 'free'. As it stands now, we are all paying high prices for this service through our carriers, and if they gain total control, we will literally 'pay the price'. This industry will become like all the others...they get greedy, the top executives are ridiculously over paid, and it becomes another financial burden for the average person to bear. For many businesses, the internet is a necessity for their survival...and imagine what the potential price gauging will do to all the school budgets!

Thank you for your time.
Sincerely,
Patti Gilbert-McCallum

I know that you have a lot of pressure from the big guys - but, I'm hoping that you do what's in the public's interest - which is not turning over our commons to large corporations - but protecting the commons and making sure that "little guys" can compete from the very beginning with the same access and speeds as the big guys.

Also, I want to decide which sites to visit and not be influenced by slower speeds on some sites vs. faster speeds on others.

I am not interested in living in a system that decides it's a good idea to allow major corporations: Comcast, AT&T and other big telecom companies to decide who can and who cannot benefit from fast Internet speed. This will slow down or block (and you know it will) everyone else, making millions in profit from it and kill freedom of speech on the internet.

There is already a social divide when it comes to access to the latest online resources-- you have to buy hardware to be able to access the internet. Then you need to pay high monthly fees to maintain access to this information recourse or continually chase down "free internet" restaurants, fast foods, or public libraries. As is, free access to information is out of the reach of many, even in advanced nations. This proposal takes us in the wrong direction-- cutting off access to even more people. We should be working to create a more equal society, at least in opportunity, but this will have the opposite affect. Don't you think the wealth divide is large enough?

The greatest public benefits of the internet are delivered to society as a common carrier where everyone gets the same deal and service for the same price, devoid of discrimination and competitive self interest of the provider. Please write your own message of support for Net Neutrality here. Average Americans face continued rising costs for all and everything. Although the internet is not a necessity like food, shelter, health care, the use of the internet for many Americans has become part of our communication tools to success -- research, on-line education, assisting children with homework and academic exploration -- just to name a few. An internet monopoly would raise costs again -- and simultaneously create a second class citizen status of "waiting" on a slower grid for information gathering for those who couldn't afford costs projected to rise in the event the internet is owned by a monopoly. Please don't allow such a sale. PEOPLE before profit must be cultivated and nurtured.

Hello,

I am a student entrepreneur trying to start a tech company with social impact. Without a free and neutral net, I will get edged out of the competitive marketplace by established companies who can pay Verizon and Comcast to deliver their pages faster.

It is entrepreneurs like me and the people we aim to benefit who will suffer with every blow to net neutrality.

I do not have sufficient legal or regulatory background to know exactly what steps you can or should take in order to protect the net. That's your job. It is important that you get this right.

Thank you,

The internet is a core component of creating a democracy. Because of the money that wealthy individuals can donate to campaigns and because 1% of people in this country have over HALF the wealth - a full 60% of wealth, and because Congress votes into law bills put forward (and written) by corporations vs. advocates for those without wealth I believe that we have become an oligarchy. For these reasons and more, accessible internet is essential. Already corporations are generating huge profits for the internet at a cost that low income people cannot afford. I know many individuals - students especially - who need the internet for college and their studies and they cannot access it because of the cost. PUT YOURSELF IN THEIR SHOES!!!! I URGE YOU TO KEEP THE INTERNET OPEN AND ACCESSIBLE TO ALL - NO SLOW/FAST LANES!!!!

So do you work for Verizon, Comcast, AT&T and other big telecom Corpocrat companies to do their bidding?

It sure looks like you work for them to all of us, and Not For The Populous That Put You In Office, HAHAHA!!!

Or perhaps before you got elected into this position of power you were hand selected by them and paid lots of money 'BRIBE MONEY' by them to do their bidding, so that's in reality why you want to kill NET NEUTRALITY how convenient for all of YOU...

Well what a surprise another scum politician bureaucrat that kisses the derier of the Corpocracy... HOW UNCONSTITUTIONAL OF YOU... Looks to me like your another purchased politician how novel, NOT!!! and noble of you FCC CHIEF NOT!!!

Letting Big Brother Corpocrats decide who can benefit from fast Internet speed and who cannot-- while slowing down, or even blocking, everyone else -- and MAKING BILLIONS in profit from this BILL, and having a private deal in sharing in these profits with them!!! How convenient of you!!!

For why else would you do such a atrocity to our freedoms that we already pay good money for anyways!!!

But of course it's never enough for you greedy scum, it's always about all of you wanting more and more $$$$$$$$$$$$$$$$$$ there is no end to your greedy machinations is there???

How much are they paying you on the side, to pass this bill?

How much of a percentage deal have you made in private with them for future payouts if you get to pass this bill for them?

How much have they offered you after you pass this bill in payments and for how long?

Any other reasoning you give to the populous for passing such an atrocious bill is ABSOLUTELY ILLOGICAL A LIE...

IT'S ALL ABOUT THE $$$$$$$$$$ POWER GRABBING THIS IS ALL THIS IS ABOUT NOTHING MORE NOTHING LESS...

Don't think for a minute that YOUR MACHINATION MANEUVERS are not transparent to the populous as to you being in bed and getting paid BIG TIME, to PASS THIS BILL by these Corpocrats!!!

With 90% of the population as well as many millions of internet companies being against not having NET NEUTRALITY it's OBVIOUS so TRANSPARENT who is lining your pockets with cash to pass this bill....

AND If you do pass this bill there will be a gigantic backlash directed at and all fingers will be pointing at YOU FCC Chairman of the board... but FCC Chairman of the board for now and for how long!!!

Once we find out you have been TAKING BRIBES ALL ALONG THE WAY IN SENATE HEARINGS!!

Please consider that while ISPs may not throttle connection speeds for companies that don't pay for faster channels, the ISPs would have little incentive to continue to improve the connections as technology improves. Only with paying companies would there be a financial reason to do so.

I was deeply disappointed to hear that the Federal Communications Commission is planning on implementing rule changes that would allow Internet service providers to pay for special, faster lanes to deliver their content. In an environment where large corporations can pay for faster service, start-ups and every day Internet users won't be able to compete and we will lose the open, free-flowing exchange of information that has made the Internet so dynamic and integral to our lives.

The FCC can ensure it has the tools to act by reclassifying broadband as a telecommunications service. I urge you to reject the new rules and to take this vital and common sense step toward protecting net neutrality.

A free and open internet is vital to global communication and economic growth. Too-big-to-fail corporations like Comcast, Verizon and other content distributors cannot be allowed to also control the content that passes through their conduits. By charging consumers on one end and content providers on the other, these companies are double-dipping and being allowed to have more power to control what our society has access to than any entity has a right to. Once they have established their regional monopolies their ability to censor content cannot be far behind. Indeed, by forcing Netflix to pay for access Comcast has already demonstrated it's ability and willingness to put aside what is best for the worlds' consumers in favor of its own greed and personal interests.

Now is the time to regulate the internet as a global utility and set the standards for what are acceptable access fees. "Reasonable charges" is not enough of a definition to preclude Comcast and Verizon from charging internet users exorbitant fees for access to content providers and, conversely, content providers such as Netflix to access their subscribers, simply because they can.

Additionally, my geographic region is supplied primarily by Comcast and secondarily by AT&T. I do not have access to Verizon's or any other internet service providers service network. This geography isolation has resulted in multiple micro-monopolies that are detrimental to consumers and economic growth.

I urge the FCC to stop considering only corporate juggernaut financial desire and start considering what is best for the people of this country, which is what it should have been doing in the first place. I urge the FCC to allow all companies to have access to the same consumers nationwide so that the best companies who provide the best products and the best customer service can compete on a level playing field for the consumers' dollar.

Thank you.

As a self-published author, losing net neutrality would put me out of business. I can't afford to pay an ISP just to make my website load at a reasonable speed. A big publishing house, on the other hand, can afford to outspend a hundred of me.

There are so many entrepreneurs and small businesses out there, and the point of the internet is supposed to be that we can all have our say - as fairly and equally as possible.

Please don't put us all out of business.

Allowing Big Telecom to exploit the Internet is simply unacceptable. It not only destroys the true nature of the Internet but it's value as a democratic institution where information can flow freely, helping to create an informed, educated and critical thinking electorate.

Giving those who possess the pipeline the power to control the access of millions is tantamount to censorship.

The FCC must serve We, the People -- not the Corporations whose only interest is profit.

Letting Comcast, AT&T, and other companies control the Internet for profit would be unfair for any one unable to pay for acceptable Internet speed. These companies already make handsome profits, and they don't need more money, especially money that they take from people for services that we should be able to take for granted.

Companies shouldn't pay to get better connection to its future customers. A free internet allows a site like wikipedia to still run free for everyone. Any site that runa on donation or any stattup will have a hard time getting on the fast lane.

A fast lane causes people to look at certain sites more. Allowing companies to generate higher ad revenue with an unfair advantage. This will make the internet like tv and all the channels you want are inaccessible.

For everyone's sake reject this piece of unfair hostage takeover of the internet. Verizon, ATT, And Comcast are rich enough, giving them more power is unwise and creates an environment that creates angry citizens and greater wealth inequality.

Prove it. Demonstrate that an informed citizenry has some actual political efficacy by doing what should be blindingly obvious is best for all regular (i.e. non-ISP owning) citizens. Reclassify broadband as a telecommunications service. Do it immediately. Anything else will bring about the death of the open internet and will be further proof that our country's democracy is totally dead. Seriously, EVERYONE who isn't an ISP wants real net neutrality. Literally everyone, though maybe not all of them know it. If we don't get it, we'll be one step closer to all of us regular citizens realizing and acknowledging that those in power don't care what we want or need, only the opinions of the rich count for anything. We all sort of know that now, but we manage to ignore it most of the time in order to get on with our lives and not be in a constant state of rage. Losing the open internet would be too much, though. That's too greedy, even for us, the incredibly apathetic public. Having to pay more for each of the online services we love, and having it no longer be possible for anyone to reach an audience for their free speech on the internet if they can't afford to pay extra to do so may actually be the spark that starts the revolution that this country is about due for.

The proposal in front of the FCC would allow Comcast, AT&T and other big telecom companies to decide who can benefit from fast Internet speed -- while slowing down, or even blocking, everyone else -- and making millions in profit from it!

This is wrong and stinks of collusion.

To Chairman Tom Wheeler and the FCC Commissioners——

The internet is a public utility. We can't live without it and the economy certainly can't function without it. It's time to stop this "fast lanes" and "slow lanes" discussion and move to regulate the internet as a public utility.

Major ISPs already have fallen back to promises and are taking advantage by monopolizing the Internet. The Internet is still a relatively new "business," which means many corporations are willing to take the extra mile in doing the extreme.

The Internet was created to freely access and transfer information to anyone from anywhere around the world. It's a means of communications that everyone has the right to. Not only that, but if implemented newly found business, specifically on the Internet, will suffer as they'll have to pay the ISPs for after speeds to customers or to even to available to some. This cripples ethics, purpose, and economical structures of the Internet. The Internet is not like television customers pay for their service, which is to provide reliable and fast Internet speeds; customers are promised "up to -- speeds," yet are almost never provided such speeds past the first month of service and these same companies were binded to install Google Fiber, but still haven't and they're purposely slowing production. The companies have amounted enough revenue to supply Google Fiber and promise the speeds that customers buy, but prefer not to in order to maximize profits. Not only that, but if this action is passed they will be "double-dipping," as in they'll not only receive revenue from customers, but from other businesses who will need to rely on them. FCCs should not be a middle man to a communication system set-up to be used freely and effectively send information between platforms. Stop this madness or we all will literally be paying for it.

As an ESL (English as a Second Language) Instructor at City College of San Francisco, I work with many low-income immigrants. I see the benefits of having open access to free internet learning sources for people trying to learn English and make a new life for themselves in the U.S. Any move by big corporations to control the speed or access to the internet seems very undemocratic. In these times of economic hardship for many, it would be irresponsible to limit or ration people's access to information and educational opportunities. Please do not allow Comcast, AT&T and other corporations to take away one avenue of freedom that many immigrants and citizens alike rely on. Thank you for your consideration.

Hello FCC I am a low income American like many of my family and friends. What you guys are about to do will actually just make more people not want the internet or your company service making your profits plummet and your company will go out of business. Remember when Rosa Parks had people boycott the bus services imagine now that 88% of the world uses internet and imagine 3/4 of that number just decided they were going to stop using your phone services and cable networking just because you want to race to see who will spend more money on internet. Honestly you guys don't realize most people don't and won't have the money to do it making this competition inevitable to your employees that are going to lose their jobs because you guys want to prove a point to each other. I feel like you guys are acting like Elementary schoolers trying to see who can race to get the best pack of crayons. It is stupid and childish and I thought you CEOs were about the age of 50 and didn't need to screw your customers over by being children, but okay lets see who wins you guys or people going about their ways without your services? We will see who wins. You don't realize that while you guys are trying to prove who is better we won't become your guinea pigs and simply separate away from the technological life and proceed as humans who can interact with other living creatures. Thank you and goodbye to your businesses.

Please write your own message of support for Net Neutrality here. With the written and televised media now a monopoly without substance, only opinion not fact, they call news reporting. With libraries closing around the country we need a net neutrality to research and find the truth. Verizon is not going to allow this to happen just like Fox news doesn't tell the truth on current events. This is our last freedom: the freedom of speech and we can not allow the fascist to take control of it.

A free exchange of expression like the internet should be open for those who would use it without causing harm, to the extent they would use it or limit its use, without having to further pay for that usage by corporate interests directing the flow and speed of internet traffic.

To Chairman Tom Wheeler and the FCC Commissioners——

The modern economy would collapse without the internet and American life would be extraordinarily disrupted. It's a simple fact that the internet is a public utility, not a private service. It's time we regulated it as such.

It is really important to me that we have equal access to this resource, and fair rules protecting it's neutrality and openness. An open internet helps me connect more, learn more, be part of bigger and different communities, and really be in touch with others all around the globe. learning from them and working with them.

I urge you to do everything you can to protect the open internet. Thank you!

The only way to ensure real net neutrality is to reclassify the Internet as a Common Carrier. Common carriers can have fast lanes (e.g., Express Mail) but they must maintain useful and modern 'slow' lanes for everyone.

It is so important that we preserve the integrity of an open internet, rather than allow the greedy whims of the mighty few to dictate our internet habits. To allow big companies to decide who can benefit from fast internet restricts and dismisses each person's individual needs; I would argue that it would impede our RIGHTS to "liberty, and the pursuit of happiness." The internet is very important to a vast majority of people - please protect it.

I am writing to protest what looks like the loss of an internet that is equally available to everyone.

The vote today tells me that once again, money talks and those with the money get what they want.

It seems a waste to talk about any oversight. Doubt that it will be done, and money could be better spent for other things.

Another loss for the Common Good.

Another move that further divides the country into haves and have not.

Subject: reclassify ISPs as common carriers
Dear FCC Commissioners,

There is only one solution that will satisfy the public and the Internet. I'm sure you're reeling from the backlash not just from the public but also from corporate titans such as Google and Netflix, so you're wondering how to stop the furor. There is only one solution--reclassify Internet Service Providers as common carrier telecommunications companies. There is no reason why they should not be considered telecom; they provide communication of information across cables, wires, and air, just as mobile phone networks do. You will face backlash from telecom lobbyists, but I assure you, that is nothing compared to the hellstorm of fury you will face from the public and the internet if you do not. Only reclassification will ensure the protections and regulations needed to maintain an open internet. Any thoughts to the contrary are pure delusions fed by lobbyist fantasies. Do you remember what happened to SOPA and CISPA. We're more upset about deregulation of net neutrality than we were about SOPA and CISPA.

Sincerely,
Adiv Paradise

Proposals to let corporations withhold efficient, quality communication from millions of Internet users, and only provide full and efficient communication to high-income subscribers and corporations, would betray the responsibility which the public has entrusted to the FCC.

The genius and lifeblood of the Internet is the free and equal participation and communication it creates for people everywhere, to join in conversation and communication.

Like a river which is the common legacy of every person in the region where it flows, the Internet is not the exclusive property of a corporation or government. To treat it as if it were, by restricting access to leverage increased profit and advantage for a few corporate beneficiaries, is an unacceptable, malfeasant diversion of a public resource.

Rather than enabling the extraction of unfair and inordinate profit, governments' and corporations' correct role is to facilitate full and equal public access to the Internet so that everyone continues to benefit from it equitably and creatively.

I call on you to act accordingly.

Net Neutrality is being mischaracterized by the FCC and the telecom industry. Net neutrality truly means *preventing* someone to be able to control the content, speed, or any other characteristics of what flows over the lines. The ISPs are carriers, period. Of course they want to be more, so that they can control content to their own advantage. This is NOT net neutrality.

some big corporations want to be able to set up a "fast lane" for their big streaming plans and to do that, they propose to throttle other internet traffic.

That really means block or make slow enough to be useless. Unless the slow users step up and pay the corporate highwaymen fees to be in the fast lane.

If you ever valued freedom and actually want to do something about it, this is where the rubber meets the road.

Chairman Tom Wheeler

Dear Chairman Wheeler,

As an Illinois consumer who depends on a fast, affordable web connection, I am concerned that a free and open Internet is now in grave danger.

We are troubled by reports that the Federal Communications Commission (FCC) plans to propose new rules that would open the door for big Internet providers to offer a "fast lane" to the highest bidders. Such a proposal would water down consumer protections, serve as a slippery slope to discrimination against certain web traffic, and force consumers like me to suffer higher rates and slower speeds.

That violates the spirit of "net neutrality."

Please, stand up for consumers, protect net neutrality, and fight for the free and open Internet.

Sincerely,

Mr. Bill Panousis

Net Neutrality here is like the freedom of speech we have enjoyed in this country. It should not be controlled by any one group or corporation. It is hard enough for people to communicate in this fast paced society so why should some big corporations like Verizon and AT&T control who has access and who doesn't. This is a clear violation of our right to communicate and have free speech. Please do not put corporate profits ahead of one of the basic principles that this country was founded on and the good of all the people. Thank You

The modern economy would collapse without the internet and American life would be extraordinarily disrupted. It's a simple fact that the internet is a public utility, not a private service. It's time we regulated it as such.

The internet is important to humanity, to the future of mankind. It has the potential to spread empathy, interconnection, learning, curiosity and peace. We would be foolish to allow it to be controlled by any individual entity, whether a government or a corporation. It is too valuable to be restricted in the name of profit for a few. It should remain free, open and egalitarian. Please protect net neutrality.

In hours, the US communications regulator will decide whether to move forward with a proposal that could kill the Internet as we know it. It could go either way -- but if we act fast we can win the votes we need to tip the balance.

The proposal in front of the FCC would allow Comcast, AT&T and other big telecom companies to decide who can benefit from fast Internet speed -- while slowing down, or even blocking, everyone else -- and making millions in profit from it!

Stop trying to kill the internet! Everyone should be allowed access to internet equally! The Internet has always been a level playing field for anyone to put out content, creativity, innovation and information. It's what's made independent media outlets reach a massive audience that would otherwise be relegated to choosing from corporate media channels like Fox News. It's the lifeline that allows small innovators to create a service that reaches almost everyone on the globe. Do not take that away!

Allowing internet service providers to create internet “fast lanes” and “slow lanes” would do nothing more than allow them to extort payments from companies like Netflix. It’s time to admit that the internet is a public utility, not a private “service.”

From: [REDACTED]
To: [REDACTED]
Date: 5/15/2014 15:03
Subject: Internet Neutrality
To whom it may concern,

I am writing to voice my opinion with regards to the upcoming Notice of Proposed Rulemaking that regards internet neutrality.

I feel obligated to express my opinion that it is a tremendous mistake to offer any internet service provider (ISP) the opportunity to in any way restrict, mitigate, impede, or otherwise alter the flow of information from any providing entity to consumers. This issue harkens back to the same debates raised in regard to companies like Standard Oil. Large corporations may not be inherently evil, but it is more or less unheard of (at least in my experience) for any entity which exists solely for the purpose of its own betterment (for profit, in other words) to be a good candidate for the safeguarding of fair and unbiased protection of public interest, regardless of whether or not that said entity's competition is involved. To establish as a legal precedent that a company may institute a "premium" broadband service that is set apart from it's typical, every day services, invites those companies to make every effort to attempt up-sell their customers, whether those customers are media providers or media consumers, to the premium service. I reference Standard Oil because that entity provides a historical precedent that if a company is given the opportunity to abuse or extort for profit, and not be punished for it, it will do exactly that.

Therefore, it seems that the wisest thing to do would be to take every measure possible to prevent any entity whatever from impeding the free flow of information, by which I mean data of any sort, over the internet, except where such limitation is necessary for the maintenance or protection of a network. We would not privatize and then place a surcharge on the passing lane of the interstates, would we? Would it be to anyone's benefit if freight companies had to charge extra to pass slower traffic? How, then, can we expect it to be to anyone's benefit (except ISPs) if we permit the creation of a privatized internet "passing lane" which becomes the sole providence of high speed and high bandwidth internet access? The additional cost to consumers may be prohibitive. What about the additional cost to companies who provide their services primarily over the internet? I doubt that they will keep their rates and fees the same, nobly burdening the extra cost of high speed internet access so that their customers need not pay more. I doubt this not because I think that corporations are evil or anything of that nature, but because it does not make any business sense to keep fees the same when overhead costs rise.

The hypothetical argument (which I am sure the individual reading this e-mail has seen hashed out numerous times before now, but whom I must none-the-less inflict this thought experiment upon) is as follows: ISP A creates a "fast lane" service, the underlying infrastructure of which it upgrades to a great degree and with greater frequency than it's "non premium" internet service. If content provider B must choose the "fast lane" service to remain competitive against providers offering similar services, it must pay additional fees to ISP A for the "privilege" of using the fast lane service. Because of increased expenses relating to the deliver of content, content provider B must now, understandably, increase it's rates in order to maintain income.

I must again urge the individual, panel, commission, body, or whatever appropriate authority in this matter to regard the internet as, quite simply, another facet of American infrastructure. As with any infrastructure (roads, radio, water, sewage) cheap and expedient access is beneficial to all, and so I hope the FCC will do it's part to ensure that the internet remains a place of true neutrality by striking the "fast lane" proposal from it's internet neutrality rulings.

Thank you for your careful attention in this matter.

Sincerely,

N. Crutchfield

The proposal in front of the FCC would allow Comcast, AT&T and other big telecom companies to decide who can benefit from fast Internet speed -- while slowing down, or even blocking, everyone else -- and making millions in profit from it!

The Internet has always been a level playing field for anyone to put out content, creativity, innovation and information. It's what's made independent media outlets like Democracy Now! reach a massive audience that would otherwise be relegated to choosing from corporate media channels like Fox News. It's the lifeline that allows small innovators to create a service that reaches almost everyone on the globe. But the FCC's proposal could kill this Internet democracy.

If the FCC passes these rules, huge companies could pay to make their websites faster and easier to use than all of their smaller competitors. The largest and richest broadband providers like Comcast and Verizon argue that they need more money to invest in new networks. But in reality, they are simply increasing profits by building up monopolies that just benefit their shareholders.

Please live up to your promise to support an open Internet and do not cave in to industry pressure.

Sincerely,
Cara Faulkner

Dear Sir(s) and/or Madam(s),

Thank you for taking the time to read this. The concept of an "open Internet" is really the concept of freedom and liberty. This is a right that each and every human being deserves.

To propose that you have authority over this last vestige of freedom shows how little faith you have in humanity.

If governing bodies believe they have the ability to control the Internet then they should also exercise their ability to end poverty, stop engaging in warfare, and cease the destruction of the ecosystem, which is also within their grasp if they chose to do so.

Freedom of the individual to express on the Internet or any other forum is essential for human evolution. It will not be without problems, but the problems that individuals create are far more insignificant and petty to the massive problems that you, the government, have created over history. Thus, I urge you to rethink your approach to society, the world, humanity, and the Internet.

To whom it may concern,

the freedom of the Internet is a crucial part of maintaining democracy both in the United States of America, and around the World. If major corporations use the Internet to their advantage without allowing other people to voice their own opinions, it only makes far greater the possibility of the United States becoming a Corporate Oligarchy, headed by corrupt evil corporations. This is why we it is unacceptable for major companies to by their corporate takeover of the Internet. Dear Leader of the FCC, please Protect International Human Rights and American Democracy by keeping the Internet free and open so that people may be able to share their differences of opinion peacefully in the Land of the Free! Thanks for reading!

ISPs will say that the internet has worked fine without net neutrality rules for years and has been a huge source of innovation and that regulating it now will kill it. What they aren't saying is that since it's invention, the internet has followed net neutrality principles as it was designed to. It has only been in the last few years that ISPs have started becoming not only service providers, but content providers, with an interest in keeping you from seeing competitors content. This leads to a desire to throttle traffic to content not created by the ISP itself. This is the very violation that they are seeking to hide with clever words and vague statements. Net neutrality regulations weren't needed before. They are now.

Please pass common sense and real regulations that protect the true meaning of net neutrality. All traffic on the internet must be treated equally. No throttling based on content or source or destination. No double charging other content providers for access to an ISPs customers. ISPs should also not be providing content.

They claim that passing net neutrality will also stifle infrastructure upgrades, yet not a single ISP company has made any plans to upgrade infrastructure. Their best interest is to keep speeds slow and offer bundles and incrementally faster speeds on what they claim are bogged down networks so they can charge more. This practice needs to end. Google Fiber is proving that ultra highspeed internet is very possible to do and greatly desired.

Another aspect here is a complete lack of competition. Most people in this country have 1, at most 2 choices of ISP. The majority only having 1. They claim there are multiple companies to choose from, but in reality, in any given area, there very often is only a single choice. They have carved the country up so that they have protected monopolies over areas. No competition means that they have no motivation or reason to increase services and keep prices low. Quality and innovation suffer. Every city that Google Fiber has come in to has seen the other ISPs almost overnight turn speeds way up and start offering lower prices. True competition is what is needed in the ISP market.

Allowing mergers between Comcast & Time Warner, or AT&T and Direct TV will only further consolidate the power behind even fewer companies further killing competition, lowering innovation, lowering quality and raising prices.

Do your jobs. Protect the market. Enforce net neutrality rules, block mergers that stifle innovation and harm the consumer.

Subject: Open Internet Laws

Without laws forcing ISPs to BUILD AND MAINTAIN infrastructure that treats all customers, traffic type, and peers the same, then just labeling them as common carrier only fixes a smaller part of the problem. We need open and equal internet where there is no discrimination based on bandwidth.

It's interesting to me that the FCC is addressing this issue now, while angst at local monopolies is at a relative high. Comcast, Verizon, et al. were digging through our wallets for extra dough through HDtv pricing and hardware rentals - people got pissed and started cutting the cord. Now they want to get that money back by increased prices based on bandwidth. So guess what's going to happen, they're going to make both the host and the client pay for the same service. That's called double dipping. If Comcast charges Netflix more, guess what? The customer is still going to foot the bill through Netflix price increases... and they're going to do it at double the standard rate.

Stop this nonsense.

The Oligarchic control of this country MUST end, and complete, unfettered Net Neutrality is a good place to start. I, for one, will not stand for mega corporations controlling and limiting our freedom and pursuit of happiness. Every bit of my entertainment and communication comes via the internet, from TV to telephone... I do not have ANY Cable/Satellite TV or standard/cellular phone, and rely on the internet for all of my needs. I get my news from the internet, the shows my wife and I watch are from the internet, when I call my mom to wish her a happy Mother's Day... you guessed it - Internet.
Do NOT allow AT&T and other mega corporations strangle people like me and my wife. We're already paying through the nose for some piss poor internet speeds.

I am very concerned about the internet remaining open for EVERYONE, not just those with big money. I think the best course of action would be for the FCC to reclassify internet service providers as Title 2 common carriers.

Net Neutrality is vital to our economy, our country's growth and freedom of expression. It evens the playing field and allows start-ups, non-profits, artists, musicians and students the ability to communicate to their audience and to access the internet and all of its options in the same way that huge corporations can. That has produced a huge amount of positive economic growth for this country in the past. It has opened up creative options which has lead to more competition and positive side effects like better television, and more access to musicians not on major labels. The open internet has had far-reaching, mostly positive affects on arts, science, business, communication.

This is just a corporate power grab. The people in charge of the FCC unfortunately seem more interested in getting paid off by corporations than by doing what the majority of the American people want. Which is to protect the open internet, and allow everyone who isn't a huge corporation - including small businesses, non-profits, artists and students - to have an equal shot at building their businesses, gaining an audience and having their voices heard.

How does Netflix paying Comcast for better access to its subscribers help the general public? I don't have Comcast but because Netflix now has a higher overhead I have to pay more for my subscription? Top this off with Comcast and other ISPs collecting money from their subscribers and you have the ISPs double dipping for the same data. Lets not forget the Data Caps that all the ISPs have.

We know that people who stream video from Amazon, Hulu, Netflix, and other sources are going to be heavy users. If we max out on our data cap the ISP will end up charging me extra to continue to have access for any given month. Why do these data caps exist? Well for Comcast, AT&T, Dish Network, and other "Cable" TV providers its to scare people into keeping their cable and not going to a streaming only. Streaming video has the cable providers scared that they are going to lose business so since they also operate the internet connections they can put a cap on us to gain extra funds that cable cutters have cost them. Europe and Asia is paying less and getting more internet than we are in the US. We are quickly becoming a 3rd world internet nation.

Didn't AT&T get broken up for unfair practices with its fellow providers? Is it fair to content providers to have to compete with each other financially just to get their data to the people who want it? How is it fair for big companies to throw money at the ISPs and those who don't or can't to linger in line waiting for the paid data to get through before it can travel.

What you are creating is unlimited funeral processions on the information super highway. Suddenly everyone one else is stuck waiting for a long train of data to make its way through before you are able to progress.

If this kind of internet control is accomplished by Comcast, AT&T and other big telecom companies, it will send our country farther down the wrong road. It will emphatically not serve the common good. Ordinary Americans are already weary of being made victims of large, relentless and skillfully camouflaged corporate forces. Many have no sense that they are being used and abused by those who define market privilege. Ordinary Americans are also sick of the legitimizing narratives that rationalize corporate greed into unscrupulous and self-interested ends. We are sick of the privatization of everything God-given including air, water, land, and airwaves. The radical imbalance in distribution and ownership is already unprecedented. Save the internet for our kids, so they can look up that word, find the tutorial on how to tie a tie, and the millions of other things that keep minds, hearts, and souls alive.

The 21st century internet is an integral part of our economy, democracy, and communication systems. America is absolutely dependent on an open internet operating on net neutrality principles.

As such, you have an obligation to regulate it as a utility. Please assert your Title II authority, and stop trying to appease the telecom giants at the expense of everyone else.

This is one of the most important free speech issues of our time, and the corporate interests that are dictating this legislation are not in the interests of the people of the USA or the world at large. We will be opening the doors to regulation of speech, and ultimately thought, by prioritizing what is important to corporations who ARE NOT PEOPLE!

Remember - it is "We the people" not "We the corporations".

After all the government grants to build the 'Information Superhighway' given to service providers over the years, we have slower speeds yet higher costs than the rest of the developed world. How is it that these companies demand even more money for traffic to flow over networks the public has helped pay for? Rediculous!

If rules like what are being proposed are passed and prioritization is allowed, there are smarter people out there than those in government that will take it upon themselves to circumvent these rules and create something new that is no longer under their control. Please consider the implications of what is being proposed here seriously, as it will impact our economic, social and technological evolution as a country.

Please do the right thing for the citizens that have collectively created the greatest communication tool known to man and tell the corporate interest to back off and throttle their greed rather than our freedoms.

An end to net neutrality would make access far more difficult for those with limited means--which of course includes artists, academics, activists, and others who use its great reach both for research and for communication with like-minded colleagues. Thus it would seriously injure the best hope for reviving the humanities and returning to real democracy in the U.S. I suspect this is *why* the FCC and its backers want the internet to belong only to those with limitless power and wealth.

What needs to end is the oligarchy now buying this country and its government.

Chairman Wheeler,

I was somewhat surprised to receive an email from you claiming you support net neutrality. The regulations you are quoted as supporting, are not compatible with net neutrality.

As opposed to your actions to the contrary, I am strongly in favor of true net neutrality. There should not be preferential fast and slow lanes on the internet. Companies like Comcast and Verizon should not be allowed to charge money to move information via the internet at preferential rates to increase their profits.

You and the FCC should also be working on regulations to require companies to push out higher speeds on the internet. Many countries around the world have higher data transfer speeds than the US by an order of magnitude. The US should have the premier internet and not a slower second rate internet.

To Chairman Tom Wheeler and the FCC Commissioners——

The internet is central to American life and the modern economy. It makes no sense to regulate it as a private “service.” It is a public utility and should be treated as such.

Please declare the internet to be a public utility

Another bad idea....Go figure, Wheeler an ex capital guy lobbying for this....He'll end up back in the private industry after he finishes the job they sent him to do.....Same old governmental practice....Doesn't matter a damn what the people want.....What the $$$$$$$$ people want is what matters.....Actually a joke that this email will ever matters....

To: Chairman Wheeler and the rest of the Federal Communications Commission,

The Internet is a vital telecommunications service in which it legally cannot discriminate between customers based on ANY criteria. Please don't allow big providers to decide what new businesses succeed or fail. The providers also own other companies that depend on Internet for sales/service and they will not hesitate to squash competition if you allow them to create fast and slow lanes. Net neutrality means no discrimination from providers! What is your definition????

Imagine how many future great minds we could be deterring with limits on what knowledge was available to them. When we choose profit over knowledge we only gain temporary empowerment as oppose to, a nation strengthen by informed citizens.

Do Not install fast lanes for the for rich and slow lanes for the rest of the United States.

The United States was the founder of the internet ,yet we have the slowest speeds and highest costs because the ISPs are allowed to run as monopolies.

ISPs should NOT be both a carrier of the internet and service provider.

FCC do your job and keep the internet open.

No fast lanes or slow lanes.

Force the ISPs to spin off their service portion of their organizations and finally make ISP common carriers as they should be.

If you can't or are afraid then force congress to make the decision for you to keep the internet open!

To the FCC—

Please build any net neutrality argument upon solid legal standing. Specifically, this means reclassifying broadband under Title II of the Telecommunications Act of 1934.

706 authority from the Telecommunications Act has been repeatedly struck down in court after legal challenges by telecom companies. Take the appropriate steps to prevent this from happening again.

Everyone benefits from equal access to the internet, to net neutrality.
If certain corporations and people are given an edge over others, there will be a backlash from the grassroots.
Unless everyone benefits, everything will stagnate - let the internet thrive through net neutrality.

Zip. I reckon 90% of people in office are guilty of bait and switch...this is another classic.

The corporate "fix" is in, again.

And with the Courts (stacked with pro-corporate appeasers and fund-raisers) we've just about put "America on eBay" – available for the taking by the shock troops of K-street.

Government has become a big pop machine: Put money in, and out pops corporate policy.

Is that what the Founders envisioned? Is that what our Service members fought and died for?

The Internet is essential and should be classified and regulated as a utility. The companies that you are currently favoring are blackmailing you and lying that they will cease infrastructure improvements if you do so. The lie is that they haven't done any improvements because they are quasi monopolies with no direct competition in their service areas. So what makes you think that they will improve infrastructure if you fall for their veiled threat? All they are worried about is profit at the expense of their customers and customer service and infrastructure upgrades cuts into profits. Our family gets an unannounced price increase at least once a year because these companies simply do not care because there's no other company to turn to as an alternative.

Dear FCC Members ~ Please NO NOT allow Comcast, AT&T et al to take control of the Internet. That would certainly not be in the best interest of internet users such as myself. I'm rather surprised you are even considering this.

Counting on your wisdom and fairness in the matter, I wish you well.

To: Chairman Wheeler and the rest of the Federal Communications Commission,

The recent "tweaks" to the Network Neutrality proposal don't come close to protecting the characteristics of the Internet that have been essential to its extraordinary value to our society. I am shocked and dismayed at today's FCC vote on this terrible proposal.

Please stop trying to fool everyone by nibbling around the edges. What's needed is clear: equal access to bandwidth on the "last mile" to the home or business, regardless of particular business or other relationships that may exist between ISPs and other businesses. It's reasonable to charge the consumer by the amount of traffic or by the latency provided to the ISP's office, but it's not reasonable to discriminate based on the source or destination of traffic. Period.

For many of us who are unable to travel and keep up with the outside world the internet is the way to stay in the loop. I don't believe Comcast, AT&T or any other big telecom company has the right to change the way I utilize my computer or add more cost to what I am already paying for. Companies seem to rate on a different level than the rest of us. If it weren't for the rest of us those companies would not be in business. Please don't take away something that works and put into place something that the majority would just have to deal with or leave behind.

And it would effect not only the US but every country on Earth. It is totally irresponsible and I ask you to listen to the voice of the people and not the voice of corporations that are interested only in their own profit. Do the right thing!

Net neutrality is critical to an informed public and to what remains of our democracy. It is a critical issue for "we the people" and it's use should not be limited in any way or structured for the benefit of large corporate profits. The FCC has the responsibility to do the right thing and maintain internet neutrality.

Keep the Internet free from corporate control. Nothing ever got better when it was controlled by corporations. Nothing. Ever. It only got better for a few people, and got a lot worse for most people. For example, cable t.v. - I can't afford it. It might be great, but I can't afford it. Satellite radio - probably awesome - but I can't afford it. I can barely pay the $40 per month I pay for internet access now. If it goes up any higher, AND IT WILL, I will no longer have access to the Internet. Please stop corporate takeovers.

As a small e-commerce business owner, Net Neutrality is the most important factor to my career. Our clothing line sponsors charities around the world and why I do not believe anyone would slow the bandwidth to our site, it is a real possibility we could not afford to pay the "premium price" for full access, etc. as we donate over 25% of our total revenue monthly.

Please consider companies like mine in your decision. The Internet and communications should be free and free of control. Helping hugs business manipulate the channels by giving them all the cards is CORRUPT and should be punished to all extent of the law.

I thank you for your time, I pray you make the bet decision for the future of our country and the planet.

The proposal in front of the FCC would allow Comcast, AT&T and other big telecom companies to decide who can benefit from fast Internet speed -- while slowing down, or even blocking, everyone else -- and making millions in profit from it! This is not fair.

Hello,

I am emailing you to let you know that I do not support your proposed rules to allow ISP to charge internet companies for access to users, or to create a fast lane for those who pay.

I use lots of the services that would be effected and I feel that this is not what the internet was intended to do. We need a free and open internet and net neutrality is a big deal. Corporations like Comcast want to lock down the internet for their own content a keep out companies like Netflix that have changed the game. Comcast has made promises before and they have broken them. There is a reason they are one of the most hated companies in the USA. Please do not adopt these proposed rules.

I use the internet for business, research and email. It would disrupt and hamper my activity (as well as everyone else's) if the net ceased to be free and open for everyone. To limit anyone for any reason is a bad idea and it is a sad day indeed that such a proposal has come to pass.

Hi FCC,
I hope you're well today.

I'm writing to you to ask that you do not allow for the Internet rate of flow to be controlled by companies like Verizon and Comcast as it is an outrageous violation of liberty.

According to our Declaration of Independence, a document meant to set our country free of the shackles of tyranny, each person is understood as being endowed with certain inalienable rights, " Life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness."

It is now in your hands to confirm the right of liberty.
The internet, as it is now without parameters of rate control, is clear and working evidence of liberty in action. It is our last bastion of hope for a shot at this very delicate idea of liberty being understood and maintained at a local and global scale. In short, It keeps tyranny at bay.

Please confirm this right of liberty and do not allow the "fast-tracking" and "slow-laning" of internet sites.

I trust that you believe in liberty and will make the right decision for all Americans both now and for the future generations to come.

Thank you kindly,

To the FCC Commissioners,

The recently proposed rules that would allow internet broadband access providers to engage in "commercially reasonable" traffic management, resulting in so-called 'fast lanes' for a fee, would squelch future internet development and hinder growth.

Services today such as Netflix, Youtube and other data-heavy services would never have been developed if created under these proposed rules as it would not have been commercially viable for them to do so.

In addition, these costs will invariably be passed on to the end-users in the form of fees and subscription costs.

I would recommend that the commission stop taking its direction from lobbyists from an industry mired in a business model that is quickly proving to be obsolete, and engage brighter minds to address what the future of the internet could, and should, become.

I request this commission deny this proposal, and allow access to the internet remain unencumbered.

If they are worried about bandwidth then they should just charge by amount of content, not Internet speeds.

The fact that these fast lanes are even being considered is absurd and serves as a testament to the massive conflict of interest in appointing a former telecom lobbyist as Chairman of the FCC. You guys are supposed to be looking out for the public, not a handful of ultra-rich corporations. Jeffrey West, a theoretical physicist at the Santa Fe Institute has presented a very interesting idea. It's one that speaks to the great modern migration to cities. It's that cities keep us looking better, being smarter and flourishing. All the serendipity of all being crushed together and developing ourselves naturally in a city scenario adds up to real evolution. He compares cities to companies, with their top-down control and statistically shown stagnation and death. This includes companies at the top: all but two of the original Fortune 500 companies are no more. According to Jonah Lehrer, West's advice is simple: when in doubt, imitate the city.

The internet is a part of this evolution. Regulate and hand over its anatomy to profit-oriented companies and the natural kismet of the populous is tampered with. Please preserve an open forum. We will all benefit.

Well, you have done it. You have finally shown, without a doubt, that the government is bought and paid for. Consumers no longer matter and laws are only being decided upon by what the opinion of the highest bidder is. While the entire country is telling you what they want, you go against all of them in favor of company interest. I want you all to know, especially you Tom Wheeler, that I find you all reprehensibly despicable and rotten at the core. From the standpoint of a college student, I am viewing what has happened over the past year with your administration to be incredibly disappointing. With former executives of Verizon and Comcast now in managerial positions at the head of the FCC, you have once again sold the freedom of the American people to the highest bidder. The amount of corruption currently being allowed in our government is staggering to say the least.

If the FCC were to allow bandwidth throttling based on decisions made by ISP's through pay walls, that would mean the end of start up companies and free market competition on the web. What would prevent a company like Verizon from providing increased bandwidth to a video streaming service they have a financial piece in, then throttling the existing sites bandwidth to make it barely usable for competitors? Any popular idea that were to emerge on the internet would be copied, then slowly suffocated through limited bandwidth resources until they are forced to sell or pay premium prices to inflate ISP profits.

I sincerely hope you reconsider your decision on allowing ISP's to throttle service as they see fit. You do not allow other resource companies, such as water and electric, to be prejudiced toward certain entities, so why would you allow ISP's to do so? Thank you for your time

Sincerely,

Heith Krueger

Dear Chaiman Wheeler:

I am writing today to urge you to reject Chairman Tom Wheeler's proposal to allow internet service providers (ISP) to charge different rates for faster access to websites willing to pay, or to allow any discretion on the part of ISPs to manage the flow of information on the internet based on who the information provider is, or their willingness to pay for access.

The internet was founded on the principle of net neutrality. And the success of that principle speaks for itself. There is no reason to allow ISPs to manage the flow of information on the internet to maximize their profits to the detriment of every other stakeholder in the internet.

Please reject Chairman Wheeler's proposal, and any other proposal that diverges from the principle of net neutrality.

Washington, D.C. 20554 May 15, 2014
Dear Chairman Wheeler, and Commissioners Clyburn, Rosenworcel, Pai, and O’Rielly:

I have been following with interest your ongoing proceeding on how best to re-implement the “net neutrality” rules. Like you, I believe it is critical that we maintain a free and open Internet, where consumers are not blocked from accessing the websites of their choice and providers do not use their control over the last mile to stifle competition. As you consider how best to move forward to achieve these goals, I write to share my concerns with reports that the Commission may not be considering achieving these goals by reclassifying broadband Internet access service as a “Title II” common carrier service. In recent years, after the initial build-out, that broadband service has been subjected to relatively little regulation. Investment, competition and deployment have dwindled and broadband consolidation and service rates have increased, all to the detriment of consumers and the American economy.

While we still have further to go to ensure that the benefits of broadband reach all Americans, I am convinced that opening the door to subjecting broadband service to some regulatory oversight, i.e, imposing Title II, is the only way to ensure this progress. I respectfully urge you to consider the effect that reclassifying to a Title II approach will have on private companies’ ability to exact extortionate fees from content providers and last mile customers. Their huge profit margins already ensure they have sufficient capital, and should be enough incentive, to continue to invest and innovate. Consider as well, the potentially huge positive impact on job creation that might result from any new innovations or next-generation infrastructure investment. I share your goals of keeping the Internet open to all. I whole-heartedly believe that a Title II approach is the best means of achieving this goal for our country.

Thank you for your work on this very important issue.

To whom it may concern,

My name is Alex Knapp. I am a resident of Georgia, residing in the 30045 zip code. I must say that the intention of the FCC to allow for a "fast lane" is insidious and short sighted, and must not be allowed to stand.

The internet is not owned by Comcast, Verizon, or any of the other heavy hitters in the ISP world. The internet was created by DARPA, funded by the tax payers, and subsequently adopted by the world. To allow for carriers to charge BOTH the subscribers and content providers in an immoral capitulation to the big money lobbyists and does absolutely nothing to preserve the greatest tools of information dissemination that the world has ever known.

Think of it this way -

I pay the city for water. The city sends me a trickle instead of the full water pressure I am paying for. When I ask why, the city claims the reservoir has not paid them to send the water to the customer at full pressure. Would this be allowed?

Why would the same be allowed for the internet? The consumer is not receiving what they have already paid for due to the greed of the ISPs that already deliver slower speeds at higher prices than most of the major industrialized nations of the world. Also, what is to stop Comcast from creating their own Netflix like company, only to then not charge them for the same data transfer speeds that Netflix has to pay. This opportunities for abuse are rampant, innovation will be stifled, and the end user will not get what they are paying for.

Classify ISPs as common carriers. If they want to charge for access to American tax payer funded technology then they need to be a dumb pipe. I don't want to see the internet turned into the cable TV of information. Free and open is the only way. Support true net neutrality. NO FAST LANES.

I beg of you.

Subject: Protect Net Neutrality
To whom it may concern,

The FCC's latest proposal to allow internet 'fast lanes' threatens to undermine the entire foundation of the internet. The internet was built on the principle of free, open, and equal access to information. Yet if the practice of 'pay for priority' becomes commonplace, that will no longer be the case. If only wealthy entities can afford to pay internet service providers for the privilege of priority, the internet will become a walled garden - the authorized content of those services who have paid their dues within, and the rest outside, still existent but frustrating to use and difficult to access.

In fact, this process has already begun. In light of Verizon's court victory in January, Verizon customers found their Netflix service to be degrading in quality, compromised by errors and video that seemed to be streaming at speeds far below what they were paying Verizon for. It transpired that Netflix's performance on the connections of Verizon customers had been dropping for months - and yet, after Netflix struck a deal with Verizon to pay a fee in exchange for a more favorable peering arrangement, those same performance metrics began to improve. It reached a similar deal with Comcast, after which Netflix performance for Comcast customers improved by as much as 65%. This is a clear snapshot of the kind of future we can expect without a neutral Net: if you have the money to pay the toll, you'll be fine. If you don't, then too bad for you and the people who want your service.

If the internet loses its neutrality, it will be a loss for innovation. It was the openness of the net that spurred its massive growth in the 90s, and resulted in the plethora of services we have today. If they had had to pay for priority, there is a very real chance that they would have been snuffed out in their infancy, abandoned by internet users for established, wealthy services with faster connections. We would still have AOL, but we wouldn't have Google or Yahoo. Independent websites and startups would suffer, unable to pay the tolls, and thus throttled by the ISPs. To say nothing of the alarming implications for free speech and censorship. If ISPs have license to throttle services as they see fit, it would be alarmingly easy for them to shape access to information, to limit access to certain viewpoints or ideas.

In short, a non-neutral net would be a win for ISPs, but a loss for everyone else. Don't let this happen to the internet. It is an utterly unique technology, one that has taken our world by storm and quickly become an essential part of our lives. Just try getting a job without it. The free and open access to information the internet provides has changed our world for the better. Don't let ISPs undo that in the name of profits. Internet service providers should be regulated as common carriers, in order to ensure the future of the internet for the good of all. In this day and age, internet access is no longer a luxury but an essential part of human life, and it should be protected as such.

Thank you,

Ian Barry

Subject: Regarding the recent vote on the "Fast Lane Proposal"

Dear Chairman Wheeler and other members of the FCC Open Internet Commission,

I am writing to add my voice to those millions asking you to reconsider your stance on net neutrality. I could reiterate the substantive social and economic arguments already made here: <http://www.savetheinternet.com/net-neutrality-101> but instead I will quote reasons given by the FCC itself in 2010, in its Open Internet Order from that year, page 17929:

"[I]f permitted to deny access, or charge edge providers for prioritized access to end users, broadband providers may have incentives to allow congestion rather than invest in expanding network capacity.

Broadband providers would be expected to set inefficiently high fees to edge providers because they receive the benefits of those fees but are unlikely to fully account for the detrimental impact on edge providers' ability and incentive to innovate and invest, including the possibility that some edge providers might exit or decline to enter the market... Moreover, fees for access or prioritized access could trigger an "arms race" within a given edge market segment. If one edge provider pays for access or prioritized access to end users, subscribers may tend to favor that provider's services, and competing edge providers may feel that they must respond by paying, too.

Fees for access or prioritization to end users could reduce the potential profit that an edge provider would expect to earn from developing new offerings, and thereby reduce edge providers' incentives to invest and innovate. In the rapidly innovating edge sector, moreover, many new entrants are new or small "garage entrepreneurs," not large and established firms. These emerging providers are particularly sensitive to barriers to innovation and entry, and may have difficulty obtaining financing if their offerings are subject to being blocked or disadvantaged by one or more of the major broadband providers.

If broadband providers can profitably charge edge providers for prioritized access to end users, they will have an incentive to degrade or decline to increase the quality of the service they provide to non-prioritized traffic. This would increase the gap in quality (such as latency in transmission) between prioritized access and non-prioritized access, induce more edge providers to pay for prioritized access, and allow broadband providers to charge higher prices for prioritized access. Even more damaging, broadband providers might withhold or decline to expand capacity in order to "squeeze" non-prioritized traffic, a strategy that would increase the likelihood of network congestion and confront edge providers with a choice between accepting low-quality transmission or paying fees for prioritized access to end users."

This is not good for the well-being of our country, period.

Respectfully,

Adrianne Daggett

Subject: Do Not End Net Neutrality

To: Chairman Wheeler and the rest of the Federal Communications Commission,

I am writing to express my outrage with Chairman Wheeler's new proposed rules to end net neutrality and sell 'fast lanes' on the internet to the highest bidder. Imagine the power company raising your rates for using the "wrong" vacuum cleaner. The water company reducing your running water because you don't use a "sponsored" garden hose. Whether you're selling a "tube" of electricity, water, or bandwidth, as common carriers they have no business extorting access to pad their profit margins.

To echo the letter sent to you by Senator Franken on April 29th, pay-to-play deals are an affront to net neutrality and have no place in an online marketplace that values competition and openness. Chairman Wheeler's new proposal would create an online 'fast lane' for the highest bidder - shutting out small businesses and increasing costs for consumers. Furthermore, it is an affront to reason that the FCC would try to change the rules of the telecommunications industry in such a way as to give even more leverage to a select few companies that already have the American consumer in a stranglehold. Despite our wealth and technological sophistication, internet access in the United States lags far behind that of many other countries, including Latvia and the Czech Republic. Internet companies in the US are already selling substandard services at inflated prices. If you think that putting more power in their hands will somehow improve conditions for American internet users, then I have a bridge to sell you in Afghanistan.

To sum up, Chairman Wheeler's "Open Internet" NRMP will be about as good for internet access and competition as the Bush administration's "Clear Skies" Act of 2003 would have been for the environment. Net neutrality and common carrier status for internet service providers are issues that I care deeply about, and I hope you will do everything possible to protect a real open internet.

The Honorable Thomas E. Wheeler, et al.

Dear Chairman Wheeler, and Commissioners Clyburn, Rosenworcel, Pai, and O’Rielly:

I have been following with interest your ongoing proceeding on how best to re-implement the “net neutrality” rules. Like you, I believe it is critical that we maintain a free and open Internet, where consumers are not blocked from accessing the websites of their choice and providers do not use their control over the last mile to stifle competition. As you consider how best to move forward to achieve these goals, I write to share my concerns with reports that the Commission may not be considering achieving these goals by reclassifying broadband Internet access service as a “Title II” common carrier service. In recent years, after the initial build-out, that broadband service has been subjected to relatively little regulation. Investment, competition and deployment have dwindled and broadband consolidation and service rates have increased, all to the detriment of consumers and the American economy.

While we still have further to go to ensure that the benefits of broadband reach all Americans, I am convinced that opening the door to subjecting broadband service to some regulatory oversight, i.e, imposing Title II, is the only way to ensure this progress. I respectfully urge you to consider the effect that reclassifying to a Title II approach will have on private companies’ ability to exact extortionate fees from content providers and last mile customers. Their huge profit margins already ensure they have sufficient capital, and should be enough incentive, to continue to invest and innovate. Consider as well, the potentially huge positive impact on job creation that might result from any new innovations or next-generation infrastructure investment. I share your goals of keeping the Internet open to all. I whole-heartedly believe that a Title II approach is the best means of achieving this goal for our country.

Thank you for your work on this very important issue.

I'm writing to you today out of concern for your vote in favor of the Notice of Proposed Rulemaking (NPRM) which allows ISPs to provide faster or prioritized service to certain internet traffic, for a fee.

Dispite chairman Wheeler's statements that "Nothing in this proposal authorizes paid prioritization despite what has been incorrectly stated today. The potential for there to be some kind of a fast lane available to only a few has many people concerned" may be technically true, but is quite misleading. What is needed is strict language explicitly forbidding any prioritization of internet traffic of any kind.

The implications of pay-for-priority are far ranging and deeply stifling to innovative technological progress. Please do the right thing and keep our internet neutral.

Subject: Let's stop pretending that the internet is a "service"

To Chairman Tom Wheeler and the FCC Commissioners——

The internet is a public utility. We can't live without it and the economy certainly can't function without it. It's time to stop this "fast lanes" and "slow lanes" discussion and move to regulate the internet as a public utility.

Private money in the hands of the few individuals and major companies that make up the 1% are already eroding and destroying many aspects of our public and democratic ways. Do not erode it further by giving into the greed of the "fast versus slow lanes" of another private enterprise that just milks money and abuses the majority. Move to regulate the internet as a public utility and ensure that it retains equal access to all.

Behave with decency and honor!

As i understand the proposal, allowing companies to pay for preferential access will destroy the internet as we know it and permit those with money to stifle those less able to pay. All access should be treated the same, and ISPs shouldn't be permitted to profit from being able to collect access fees.
Let's have true net neutrality.

Subject: The "Open Internet" Will Be Disastrous!!!
To Chairman Wheeler and Whom It May Concern:

I find the proposed changes to net neutrality very troubling. Internet service providers should not be able to discriminate against internet traffic.

In many areas of the United States, there is only one ISP available. They already hold a monopoly, and with these new measures, they will be able to limit a user's access by favoring the content and services they own or made deals with. The loss of net neutrality will be disastrous for independent media and small businesses. If they don't pay ransom to the ISPs, then they'll be stuck in the slow lane.

The "Open Internet" proposal cannot be passed, or else there will be terrible repercussions with our economy and it will have an appalling impact on free speech. Please do not pass these measures!

To: Chairman Wheeler and the Federal Communications Commissioners,

The people have spoken loudly, and we want net neutrality! Nothing else will suffice. You have a responsibility to protect the digital commons for the people of this country. Instead, you propose ineffective regulations and mouth platitudes that are meant to mollify us, with the end result being that cable and telecomm companies will have the keys to the Internet. Is this the legacy that you want? You have a real choice to make: stand up for the people and a democratic Internet, or cozy up to Big Telecommunications.

I still have hope that you will do the right thing.

It looks like the FCC is more interested in generating higher profits for corporate users of the internet than in protecting the interests of regular Americans.

After more than a million Americans expressed their concern about net neutrality, do you really think that we will go away and forget the actions you take here? Do you really think you can hide this latest corporate give-away so that no one will notice?

Protect the interests of ALL Americans, not just those who can pay the most. And, in the process, protect your own reputation and place in history. Do the RIGHT thing here. Keep Net Neutrality!

Subject: Internet Freedom

Internet speeds need to be the same for all users. If we allow ISP's to chose who gets fast internet speeds then what is to stop them from providing slow speeds to organizations that they don't support politically. Where will this end? The answer is it will not. Once we allow ISP's to dictate who gets to have fast speeds we have lost the ability to openly and fairly communicate on a even plain. Just as with citizens united, those that have money will be able to speak louder and their control will only increase.

Plus, don't we all help to pay for some of the internet infrastructure. Is this not a public service. Could a water company charge extra for cleaner water?

Subject: Net Neutrality Must be Maintained

This is your chance to correct past mistakes and make a genuinely positive impact on the future of this country. You can make a real difference just by doing the right thing. All you have to do is maintain net neutrality and start doing what it is the FCC is supposed to do, regulate the carriers. Don't let them put a strangle hold on innovation. Please preserve the innovation incubator that is today's internet. It has driven so many advances in technology already. It's not rocket science folks, the internet its a utility and everyone needs fair and equal access to it. We will only become more and more dependent upon it as we move forward. Please do the right thing.

In 2002, the FCC made what would turn out to be a pivotal mistake. Instead of stating the blindingly obvious — internet service is a utility just like landline phone service — the FCC tried to appease the out-of-control corporate egos of behemoths like Verizon and Comcast by pretending internet providers were special and classifying them as "information service providers" and not "telecommunications carriers."The wrong words. Then, once everyone was wearing the nametag they wanted, the FCC tried to impose common carrier-style telecommunications regulations on them anyway.

You've betrayed the hearts and minds of the American people and made a mockery of your office. The people of the United States are well aware that you are a corporate crony for the ISPs and especially Comcast. By allowing the Paid Priority Internet proposal to be approved, you've thoroughly sold-out the single greatest technological marvel to the highest bidders.

You have instilled a new reign of now legitimized corporate ransom and dealt a lethal blow to the already fragile American economy. But there is a way for you to make this situation right again.

Revoke the proposal, issue a public apology for your actions, and immediately resign your position to someone more worthy of your title. Nothing short of this will cleanse you of your sins.

Dear FCC

I email you in regards to the proposed legislation, and I want to tell you how the free and unrestrained internet is not subject to your opinion.

First, if you value the free maket at all you will throw away any legislation to change how the internet works right now, because by ruling tht internet access or speed can in any way be altered by companies in the way allowed will mean stranglign every entrepreneur or starting up business. Not to mention already existing smaller businesses.

Second, passing even the altered version of the legislation will have grave effects on people all over the world, because the internet does not work by country lines. One country's legislation affects every other country's quality of experience. Lets say for the sake of argument that because of your legislation YouTube suffers a disadvantage to Netflix, While you intended this to only affect Americans, people in Europe or even Asia will also have their quality of experience affected because YouTube is a service based in USA.

Now, if this happened back when Youtube was still starting up there is no way they could afford the legal fees and the disadvantage alone would cost them a number of users, effectively killing a starting business before it even gets fully started.

Last, I believe you have already felt the effects this kind of law could have on such services as you were recently victim to a hacking attack that halted your internet speed. It was all across the independent media.

And that's another thing. Independent media would suffer greatly without net neutrality, they would never be able to compete with major news outlets the way they can today.

The ONLY thing you should do in regards to Internet neutrality is to reclassify the Internet as a Title 2 Common Carrier.

Believe it or not, accept it or not, the Internet IS a universal utility at this point, and needs the protection all other utilities receive.

With best of expectations,
An International Internet User.

Subject: Say No to the Internet Fast Lane
FCC Commissioners,

I don't know if these e-mails actually get read, or if you just look at the volume to gauge public reaction, or if you ignore them completely, but for the purpose of this e-mail, I'm going to choose to be an optimist and assume the former.

In which case, I'd ask that you consider turning down and to cease considering the concept of allowing internet fast lanes or priority access. In a market where fewer and fewer options are available to the average consumer, due largely to corporate mergers, letting internet providers give priority access to specific companies would essentially destroy the level playing field that is the internet. By accepting this as an option, we're telling everyone who uses the internet to make their livelihood that it's not enough to create the best product, cultivate the best customer service, or market your brand in the best way - now you have to pay another company so customers won't get frustrated when it takes 2-minutes to connect to their site.

What about educational institutions? Do you think that online educational outlets are going to be able to afford the fast lane? Should students and teachers have to suffer because the online resource they're trying to reach can't pay a few million dollars (or more) to make their site a preferred customer with internet providers?

Ultimately, this benefits nobody except the internet providers who get to double bill for access to the same site (customers who pay for the internet so they can reach the site, and then the site itself if it wants a connection to that ISP's customers that supports adequate streaming).

No one but ISPs benefit from this. The ISPs might be able to buy you a nice dinner as they lobby for your support, but they aren't your customer. The American people are. Emphasis on the actual people.

Don't make this mistake.

Keep net neutrality alive.

Please.

Sincerely

Alexander Walker

Subject: Net Neutrality
Hello,

I'm writing to ask the FCC to please reclassify ISPs as Common Carriers.

Businesses and individuals rely on the Internet being open and consistent across all services, websites, email, etc.

If ISPs are continued to be allowed to charge companies like Netflix to ensure speedy delivery then what are small businesses going to do when the ISPs charge them fees that only large companies like Netflix can pay? The end result will be the death of small businesses that would have helped foster healthy competition in the marketplace.

In addition the Comcast merger should be off the table. In the city I live in, Los Angeles, the only option is Time Warner. The market already needs fixing without putting more fuel on the fire by allowing Comcast to merge with Time Warner. We should have more choices not less.

On top of all of these problems the fact that Time Warner, Comcast, and pretty much all of the ISPs are also content providers poses other problems related to consumer choices being limited and disrupted.

Do not continue to allow their lobbying power to overturn the power of a free market which contains healthy competition that is vital to overall economic prosperity.

Thank you,

Marisa Stotter

All Americans should have affordable access to robust and reliable broadband products and services. Regulatory policies must promote technological neutrality, competition, investment, and innovation to ensure that broadband service providers have sufficient incentives to develop and offer such products and services.

Competition in the provision of communication services, both domestically and overseas, supports the Nation's economy. The competitive framework for communications services should foster innovation and offer consumers reliable, meaningful choice in affordable services.

Any of this sounding familiar? One of the FCC's primary functions is regulating communications providers to ensure that they provide efficient access to their services without discrimination at a reasonable price. You claim to be for an Open Internet, yet time and again you have consistently worked to compromise the very tenets upon which the FCC was built.

The current "fast track" plan is the antithesis of the FCC's stated goals. It will allow communications providers to provide inefficient access to their services on a discriminatory basis at unreasonable prices. The FCC has already failed to foster competition among Internet Service Providers. It allowed them to merge and grow into huge corporations and effectively collude with one another to split up the United States and not compete with each other. Haven't we suffered at the abusive hands of overprotected ISPs who have been intentionally stagnating broadband services in the United States for the last decade to make a quick buck?

Cut the crap and reclassify last mile Internet service as a Type II Common Carrier Telecommunication Service. It's bad enough that you are letting giants like Comcast get away with selling exceedingly slow broadband access for an exorbitant price without giving them the power to further literally extort content providers and customers if they want what they already paid for.

Subject: Tiered internet is bad for science and technology sectors
I have been working in science data systems for decades and I have grave concerns about the FCC allowing commercial entities to price consumers and other people who depend on internet service out of high-speed network infrastructure.

In the sciences, we depend heavily on not just public internet services such as Internet 2, but also a hodge-podge of commercial service providers who offer overpriced, low-performance services that are often the only option available especially in field programs that operate outside of academic institutions.

In science, bandwidth and the cost of bandwidth remain one of the greatest challenges preventing researchers from building large-scale data, observational, and analytical capacity necessary to meet 21st century challenges.

On the commercial side, the lack of available and affordable bandwidth has had a detrimental impact on entire regions, such as Cape Cod, where technology startups find that the advantages of being located near national research facilities such as WHOI and the MBL are outweighed by poor bandwidth to the region.

The actions the FCC is taking now establish a precedent where high-speed internet access, which could easily be made available to everyone and set a level playing field for private, non-profit, and public science and research companies, laboratories, and academic institutions, is instead reserved for only the highest-paying corporate customers.

This would squander a national resource which is already in such need of attention that it is a source of embarrassment in the international community, as the US trails many other countries in affordable high-speed internet access.

It is essential that you do the right thing or it will take decades to repair the damage, and in the meantime any leadership in research and technology that we currently enjoy will be harder and more expensive to maintain as we lose technical expertise to countries that provide adequate, affordable bandwidth to technical and research communities.

Countless unborn American enterprises and America's economic dominance of the internet are at stake here. And for what? For established content companies with vested interests who have not invested in their poor infrastructure? These companies may not have traditional monopolistic structure, but at the local/municipal/household level, they indeed have monopolistic structure. Internet is poorly transmitted via satellite. These companies offer little innovation or value to the consumer. The value comes from the content, not the provider. They should be reclassified as utilities.

As a Democrat, I am deeply disappointed. Courage to stand up to vested interests is desperately needed. So far, no one is showing courage.

Subject: Internet "fast lanes"...

Please, please, please... DO NOT DO THIS. I have worked in the telecom industry and if you open this can of worms we will all suffer for it. Companies like Comcast and Verizon WILL find ways to pervert the prioritization of packets and use that to hold companies hostage. Terms like "Commercially reasonable" will not stop them. Who will decide what is "Commercially reasonable"? The strength of the web is and always has been that it is an even playing field.

If you insist on going forward with such a plan, at the very least limit it to internal servers. The "last mile" between ISP's and customers must remain open. I fear if it is not, then we will start to see tiering to customers based on these rules. These companies are tricky. Imagine being charged more by your ISP if you run a server from your home and use more than a certain limit of data. Who will decide what amount of data? And who will decide what is a "commercially reasonable" cost in these cases?

This is a slippery slope. While I understand the need for monetization to build out networks, I also understand the need for a level playing field to keep the web thriving.

Subject: Public Commentary on Proposed Net Neutrality Laws
Hello,

My name is Nicole Goad and I live in Austin, Texas. I wanted to write to you today expressing my feelings on net neutrality as a member of the voting public.

I am a product of the 80s and I remember the wonder when my computer teacher told me in second grade that we could learn anything we wanted on the world wide web. She told us that the internet offered a virtual library for exploration and understanding. I was shocked, it sounded like something out of science fiction. I knew what a computer was but I didn't know you could explore so deeply. My family didn't have a computer but here was one at school that could tell me facts about my favorite animals or what year the first space flight took place. I loved the internet.

I've used the internet in both academic and personal pursuits ever since that first day of computer class. I've made my own geocite (back in the day!) and spent time editing articles on Wikipedia when I had knowledge on the topic. I used AIM chatrooms to connect with those in far away places as a middle school student and waited hours for for a song to download when dial up was present in all of the homes. Today I use internet daily for my job. In fact, without the internet, I'm not sure I would ever know what meetings to attend or what tasks to complete.

I say all of this to implore you to please keep the internet out of the hands of larger companies. The ability to throttle access to websites greatly impairs a user's ability to seek and find resources that they want to view. The internet is the last great portal of free speech. You can find opinions, knowledge and news about any country, any school of thought, and have a true connection with those all around you, even if they compete against your own views. Big companies should not be allowed to dictate what I have access to as a consumer. I already pay for the ability to access the internet and I should not have to pay even more to access a site online.

One of the largest problems with the proposed rules is that I haven't seen a cost-benefit analysis. I'm eager to hear how these rules benefit me as a consumer because thus far I've seen no statements to prove that these limitations would be helpful to me. It appears that I'll only see search results from companies that have deep pockets to advertise.

I work in advertising. I know how important it is to generate dollars in a world where consumers are ever expecting content for free but this fight isn't about a lack of revenue for those giants Comcast and Time Warner, it's firewalling consumers from having direct access to any content they want to find on the internet.

Please keep the internet neutral. I'm afraid that we'll lose out on the opportunity to explore freely without filtered/paid results if these new regulations take place. Let the internet be bastion of free speech and exploration for anyone who wants to learn, know, seek and do.

Thank you,
Nicole Goad

I rely on the internet for my education and my future as a developer. Adding priority to some data would hinder other data. This topic to me is not unlike the civil rights and the fight for equality. The internet has reshaped the entire world and should not be segregated into different classes. Limiting people's monthly usage on top of priority "fast lanes" would severely damage streaming services, online university's and distribution of software. The internet has given people with disabilities the ability to easily make purchases from their homes. The internet has helped expose corrupt governments and given a voice to those that have been oppressed. Creating tiers and limitations to the internet would damage humanity's global connectivity and limit access to our collective knowledge. Not having an open internet should not only be illegal but considered a violation of human rights.

Dear FCC,

I am writing to oppose rules that will allow for discrimination on the Internet - where the wealthy can purchase faster Internet service and everyone else continues to have slower service.

I do not want telecom giants and wealthy Internet companies to determine the future of the Internet. I want new ideas to flourish on the Internet and not be blocked because they do not have sufficient funds to purchase fast service and compete.

I do not want the Internet to be turned into another vehicle that allows money to flow from working Americans to the wealthiest -- where web-based services like Netflix purchase faster service and pass the costs on to consumers.

The proposal being considered would kill rather than protect Net Neutrality and allow rampant discrimination online. The Internet should be viewed as a public good and should be operated consistent with our rights to Freedom of Speech and Freedom of the Press. Turning the Internet into a pay to play scheme is unacceptable.

I believe support for Net Neutrality is fundamental to the protection of our First Amendment rights in the 21st century. Putting any sort of restrictions on the flow of ideas or communications on The Internet would cause irreparable harm to the, already unequal, influence and power in this nation. It would stifle growth and technology that is necessary for businesses to survive.

Please do the responsible thing for the country and support Net Neutrality.

It is in everyone's interest, including special interest groups, to keep the internet open. No fast lanes should be created. The explosion of technology advances over the past 15-20 years likely would not have occurred at the same pace, if we had a premium fast lane. A big number of technology advances are started up by smaller individuals and entity's who would likely be ousted out of the playing field, had their been an internet fast lane. Special interest groups will ultimately benefit from keeping the internet open, too. Everyone will. Please do the right thing, and keep with an open internet policy. Also, please create rules prohibiting the creation of an internet fast lane, to ensure that future generations do not have to tackle this issue once more.

The fact that I must send this email worries me. The solution is painfully obvious and the people have very loudly expressed their opinion.

Do not allow ISPs to interfere with data. Reclassify ISPs as Title II common carriers, immediately.

Do not allow them to charge a premium for “faster” service. Forcing fees on companies and start-ups for “faster” service will force smaller companies under the rug. They won’t be on equal footing with larger ones that can afford to pay these fees. It gives larger companies a completely unfair advantage. This policy of data throttling will coke the internet to death. It will mean that I as a consumer will have to pay more for the services I use as companies will simply pass on their new found baggage to their customers. It means that ISPs will be able to give preferential treatment to their own websites, stores, and steaming services because they will not have to compete with companies that must pay for data service. It is an abhorred scene to even imagine.

I hate that I must beg and plead with a board of bureaucrats that are not elected, yet get so much power, to simply stop taking what is clearly the wrong course of action.

The information running through the internet is like electricity running through wires. The utility company doesn't charge more if you have a Sony television rather than a Samsung. They don't charge more for avoiding "brown-outs". I'll tell you right now that without regulation, that's exactly what the utility monopolies would be doing.

It is crazy to think that the internet is anything other than a utility that deserves honest and fair regulation.

Dear FCC,

Given the recent ruling about the proposal I'd like to make my concern and thoughts known.

As an active developer and entrepreneur on the internet, net neutrality is very important to me. With the way that many service providers are structured, a world without net neutrality will hurt me and many others on the internet. Most people have an illusion of "choice" for who can provide their internet service, and if their service is poor they are unfortunately stuck with it in many cases.

The internet is proving to be more and more of a necessity in every day life. As such, I strongly believe that the FCC should classify providers as Title II Common Carriers to provide protections for consumers. Let's force service providers to actually compete on an open market to provide better service. People should not have the illusion of choice when it comes to who provides internet, but should rather be able to have a choice.

I wish I could be as succinct as this, but this description from Vi Hart describes how I feel pretty well:
https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=NAxMyTwmu\_M

Let's work on actually keeping an open internet.

To Chairman Tom Wheeler and the FCC Commissioners——

The internet is a public utility. We can't live without it and the economy certainly can't function without it. It's time to stop this "fast lanes" and "slow lanes" discussion and move to regulate the internet as a public utility.

To Chairman Tom Wheeler and the FCC Commissioners——

To the FCC——

Please build any net neutrality argument upon solid legal standing. Specifically, this means reclassifying broadband under Title II of the Telecommunications Act of 1934.

706 authority from the Telecommunications Act has been repeatedly struck down in court after legal challenges by telecom companies. Take the appropriate steps to prevent this from happening again.

The internet is a cornerstone of modern life -- from our day-to-day live to businesses and jobs. We simply can't live without it, so it's time to declare that it is a public utility, not a private "service." The mega-businesses already make a fortune as it is. If they have to foot some of the bill to ensure that all receive service equally, then so be it - count it as an operating cost. When was the last time we have heard any of their CEOs getting anything less than some obscenely overvalued bonus? They can afford it!

The 21st century internet is an integral part of our economy, democracy, and communication systems. America is absolutely dependent on an open internet operating on net neutrality principles.

As such, you have an obligation to regulate it as a utility. Please assert your Title II authority, and stop trying to appease the telecom giants at the expense of everyone else.

Net neutrality is a necessity for modern democracy. The number of cases where tyrants have been exposed despite their State news service's best efforts to whitewash their crimes and protect them is proof of this fact. And this is precisely why I am obliged to write you today, demanding that REAL net neutrality be preserved for the good of the People. Are the corporations that run our government through their legislative puppets feeling the need to silence this power of the net? Absolutely. What stands in their way? Supposedly, you do... the FCC. Of course, you are a government agency, so can we really trust you to act in defence of democracy --the power of the People (as opposed to the power of multinational corporations)? Only your choices can tell us the answer to that question.

I/we are asking you to take a firm stand in the People's defence --in democracy's defence-- by enacting, enforcing, and defending strong net neutrality regulations STARTING TODAY.

The world is watching.

Net neutrality is a right by which many of us exercise our free speech. It must be maintained as free, open and neutral to protect our rights which have already been trampled by the wealthy 1 percent who indeed DO have their right to speak constantly enhanced and improved through Citizens United and now McCutcheon. These are a total aberration of our Constitution and the democratic principles that once made the United States a great nation rather than the stinking oligarchy we now have.

To whom it may concern,

The internet needs to remain open in order for it to work properly. It was created in the first place to share information. By closing it or only partially open for those that can afford it, you are dooming its intended purpose.

Thanks for your consideration.

Do not betray the principle of equal access to the internet. We need stronger net neutrality protections, not giveaways to corporations who have employed FCC higher-ups in the past, or may have promised to do so (again) in the future. The American people, and the people of the world, deserve better than that level of sleaziness.

If this is open internet vs. corporate monopolization of access and speed is another greed-driven scheme (which is what sounds like), it will ultimately backfire. People will seek other options, and some of our most creative minds may even vote with their feet by opting for more user-friendly places overseas. Not sure how that benefits the US.

Think ahead - think fair, and things will work out well. Allow greed to take the lead, and you will pay for it sooner or later.

Relinquishing this to corporate control would represent an obvious lack of concern for the core principles that are supposed to uphold our governmental theory and policy. I work online most of the day. I cannot afford to have my connection slowed down or charged more for a faster connection only to accommodate the profit hunger of telecomm monopolies.

We need a regulated Internet policy that guarantees neutrality and puts us as par with so many countries that have faster connections at a fraction of what we pay now.

Finally the planned merger of Comcast with Time Warner should not be allowed to move forward. Federal regulators should not be making room for monopoly takeover of telecommunications. We should be breaking them up.

The Internet has until now been a force for free communication and creative inspiration throughout the world. Giving corporations the ability to cramp or even sever those lines of communication based on the subscriber's wealth will only hurt the growth of our nation in the long-term. Think about the needs of the country, and how many people will have a better chance to make a better world for all Americans if the Internet is allowed to continue to be neutral ground for rich and poor alike.

I think you made a colossal mistake with radio broadcasting do not make the same mistake with the internet..

When does the Corporate Greed End?

If there is not a level playing field somewhere, the idea of Freedom ceases to exist altogether.

The Internet provides education, opportunity, communication, etc.

When such basic and powerful tools are threatened for the People, we can only assume the intention is Malevolent.

Stop trying to drive us into extinction.

There is plenty for ALL. Learn to share.

Hi, please support net neutrality and reclassify broadband as a telecommunications service. I run a mobile based startup. If net neutrality fails to be preserved, the survival of my small business (and many others like it) could be in jeopardy.

Thanks,

The internet has become the most powerful and important tool for citizens of a democratic government to exchange the essential information we need to be an informed voting body. Net Neutrality must be maintained if we are to remain a democracy .. or to take back our democracy.

Please do not take the voices of the people away by making it possible for the most wealthy and powerful to control what we see and say on the internet.

The internet is a communication medium, nothing more. Content providers are separate, and should never be allowed to control access. The United States is already behind much of the industrialized world in terms of broadband speed and cost, due to our too weak regulation. We should be requiring a "fast" lane for everyone instead of just the wealthy content providers.

Julian Metter
United States of America

It is absolutely unconscionable to introduce any measure which allows money to control services or internet resources in any way. The fact that this is directly tied to a corporate appointee who has once again tried to "slip a fast one by us" in the form of a complex and deceptive bill is disgusting and demonstrates the degree to which our "democracy" is a sham on every level.

Please remember that this is all part of the larger dilemma that faces us as the American corporato-cracy moves forward in it's domination of every aspect of our lives. Take a stand now and say no in this encroachment. We must vigilantly protect the internet as a stream of information and not allowed net equality to be chipped away.

Subject: Reclassify the Internet as a common carrier

To: The Commissioners of the FCC

Your proposed path would open the door to widespread discrimination online. It would give Internet service providers the green light to implement pay-for-priority schemes that would be a disaster for startups, nonprofits and everyday Internet users who cannot afford these unnecessary tolls.

I urge you to scrap these proposed rules and instead restore the principle of online nondiscrimination by reclassifying broadband as a telecommunications service.

Please don't ruin the internet because of greed. Enough is enough; how many things have been done for the sake of money? It's not going to be worth it, now or later. Keep it free, keep it neutral, and the field can stay level. No one has any form of biased advantages because the opponent didn't have the money to pay for it. It's ridiculous that this is being debated; do what's right and keep it free. We're counting on you guys to do the right thing here, so don't cave in to lobbyists or corporate leaders; instead try to understand that if you do not keep the internet free, you are cutting off human rights across the globe in a large capacity.

FCC—

The 21st century internet is an integral part of our economy, democracy, and communication systems. America is absolutely dependent on an open internet operating on net neutrality principles.

As such, you have an obligation to regulate it as a utility. Please assert your Title II authority, and stop trying to appease the telecom giants at the expense of everyone else.

Keep our internet free and open. Please don't allow big telecom companies to benefit from fast internet speed, while others are in the "slow lane." This is not what the internet was designed for.

The internet is no longer a luxury - it is a vital communications utility, and should be treated as such. Please preserve a free and open internet. Corporations already control far too much in our daily lives, and this trend must be stopped. I do not live my life to please shareholders, and my free and open communication is sufficiently important to my personal life that it must be protected. I am a citizen, not a corporate asset.

FCC members,

I urge you not to slow or block the internet just to gain a profit. It's not a secret that these big telecom companies already have plenty of money. But to take advantage of something that people universally use on a fairly equal basis, that's cruel. Do you want to be remembered as the people who took equality away and shamed the principles of the United States?

Taking into account the research I have done, I have deemed that it is too early to begin doling out Internet privilege to anyone. Keeping it a common resource will be helpful so that we can continue to examine the effects of the Internet and social media services on a psychological and societal level at micro and macro scales.

The public does not want it, and will not be served by it. Undermine net neutrality and you are sacrificing the public interest to the private interest in the most blatant and egregious way. The public will not stand for it, and they are right not to.

To Whom It May Concern:

I am deeply concerned and gravely disappointed that the FCC would propose rules that would allow "pay for priority" in any form when considering the net neutrality issue. Allowing for ANY situation in which an Internet service provider (ISP's) can charge content companies for faster and more reliable delivery of their traffic is appalling. In a free and accessible internet, ISP's should be prevented from holding content hostage for higher fees. ISP's already charge customers to deliver this content. They should not then be allowed to charge content companies on the other end as well. This will result in unfair cost increases to consumers. This will also provide unfair advantage to established companies with deep pockets at the expense of smaller innovative companies.

Internet service providers already have too much control over the Internet, which is why Internet speeds are so much less than other countries (despite heavy subsidies in the past and even now). The new rules will only accelerate the US descent into a mediocre Internet infrastructure.

Sincerely yours,
Paul Nyirjesy

This proposal is completely and totally opposed to anything the Founding Fathers ever stood for, so don't even think about eliminating Net Neutrality, or else consider yourself a traitor. Remember that you represent The People of the United States, not The Commercial Interests of the United States.

It is the accessibility of the Internet to all that makes it such a great resource. If you allow the existence of a "fast lane" for commercial interests, it will die, and all the labor to have created it will be in vain.

I believe you have all make the wrong choice, by voting to end open internet. Those who will benefit are those with more money and Chairman Wheeler, it will just become yet another forum dividing the "Haves" and the "Have Nots". Protect all the people's rights to open internet. Change your vote now vote to maintain net neutrality.

Please keep the internet free. My Mom is 84, years old and deaf, lives 4 states away from me and the internet is the only way we are able to communicate. I would be heartbroken if I would no longer be able to play scrabble with her on FB and message her daily to see how she is.

Thank you,

To Chairman Tom Wheeler and the FCC Commissioners——

To the FCC——

Please build any net neutrality argument upon solid legal standing. Specifically, this means reclassifying broadband under Title II of the Telecommunications Act of 1934.

706 authority from the Telecommunications Act has been repeatedly struck down in court after legal challenges by telecom companies. Take the appropriate steps to prevent this from happening again.

Sincerely,

The proposal in front of the FCC would allow Comcast, AT&T and other big telecom companies to decide who can benefit from fast Internet speed -- while slowing down, or even blocking, everyone else -- and making millions in profit from it!

We the people of the United States paid to assist the development of the internet. We also pay monthly to use the internet and have some of the Slowest speeds in the world, at the highest cost. Why, not develop fiber-optic cable for each city? Have those same companies PAY, for the service, and charge their customers the same amount.

I am so tired of increased Cost, and crummier- SLOWER service.

MAke the INTERNET a UTILITY, and regulate the cost for all.

Subject: On the subject of 'Net Neutrality'.

Respected Commissioners,

Whether you read this directly or not or it simply ends up in a tally column, I appreciate your time and the ability to have access to you. This access is an amazing tool that has helped better the way our public servants and services are able to communicate with the public they represent and serve. It comes via the internet. A bit of a technological wild west maybe, but I see it more like King Arthur's fabled Round Table. No head and no foot, all equal.

I remember when I was a teenager and we got our first home computer with internet access. It was crazy. Chat rooms!?! I can just talk to these random people from all over the country and potentially world?! It was surreal. I could play games with them, email them, chat live with them. I have an amazing friend now who lives in the Netherlands and has been to visit me here in Kansas City twice! He's planning on coming back a third time for my wedding. I likely would never have met him and formed that bond without the internet.

Fast forward to today and now I can easily look up a new recipe, connect with friends and family, purchase a new digital song or book for my electronic device, read up on an agriculture paper from Kansas State on tomato hybrids, order some jewelry for my fiancée, or sell my stuff on ebay. All of that was impossible when I was 13, and it's everyday stuff now that I'm 33. Except for the jewelry - can't be buying that every day.

All of this was made possible by unfettered innovation. The internet is an amazing tool that can be harnessed to create new services and products out of our wildest imaginations. It's had some dark sides to it as well, but I believe it's changed the world immensely for the good. I can use Kiva.com to crowd source micro loan money to a farmer in the Philippines. I can research symptoms of an illness on Webmd. I have the perfect jumping off point to educate myself on almost limitless topics thanks to Wikipedia. Major universities offer classes online now for continuing education. My local blood-bank sends me an email when I am eligible to donate again. As a consumer I have the ability to research products and read reviews by other users instantly.

All of this is just scratching the surface on it's every day contributions to me as an individual, and to society as a whole.

Please, please, please institute rules and regulations that help keep the internet equal to all. This should be considered a basic utility like drinking water in my opinion. Information is power and the internet helps us all be more powerful in our everyday lives.

Please keep not for profits, schools, startups, bloggers, content generators, fans of any hobby/sport who create content from having to compete with Facebook, Ford, GE, Netflix, Amazon, Ebay and scores of others for equal access to the internet public. Protect net neutrality. We so rarely have a clear opportunity to preserve excellence for our future generations - don't let this opportunity pass you by.

Thank you again for your time,

RJ Stafos

Kansas

All of this is possible because

Subject: Open Internet
Commissioners,

The internet was made by the government and since has grown into being a necessary tool of citizens everywhere. Why should government now allow a few companies to create legal monopolies that extort exorbitant fees from consumers AND from content providers, in the name of "openness"?

Is it truly an open internet when we are considering allowing Comcast, Time Warner (soon to become Com-Warner megaopoly which is an entirely separate, equally disturbing, issue) to charge content providers to "guarantee" or "speed up" access? No. It isn't. That's an internet run by terrorists who extort bribes from companies in exchange for guaranteeing delivery.

If a telecom wanted to charge extra to have a call connected between me and Apple Support it would be illegal. Why should it be considered legal for Comcast or another company to charge Google or Amazon more money to guarantee that I can access their sites?

It shouldn't be.

Don't allow the internet to become another way for companies to get richer at the expense of average Americans. It should be open to everybody, equally. Regulate it the same way telecoms are regulated. Limit the monopoly powers of these mega companies who only desire to get richer at the expense of citizens without providing adequate services.

This will limit the right of free speech which is stated in the first amendment. It also destroys the foundation with which the internet is based on, a neutral non-biased medium with which to communicate. So this whole corporate dominated internet service is not just.

Please do not allow the internet to become the domain of big telecom companies. We demand that it remain free and open and recognized as a Public Utility that enriches community, communication and lives regardless of class, financial status and or politics. It must never be controlled by private industry. The FCC is abusing his mission to protect the public interests if it allows this proposal to stand.

Removing net seutrality would remove competition and obligate subscribers to buy services they do not want or need. All users should have open and equal access to the internet at affordable rates. Ending net neutrality is bad for consumers and bad for the US.

Allowing ISPs to make distinctions in how they serve packets from different sources destroys the core of Net Neutrality. Safeguards intended to prevent "abuse" are not a substitute for keeping the internet a free and open medium of communication. ISPs serve a similar role to phone carriers in providing unbiased communications, and ought to be properly listed as telecomms providers.

The proposed changes destroy net neutrality while allowing ISPs to selectively offer access to network upgrades only to those willing and able to pay extra for them. This is an anticompetitive and innovation-killing plan, and ISP claims that it will make them keep investing in new network capabilities are belied by their existing failure to invest.

Don't give up a free and innovation-friendly internet on the basis of vague promises and idle threats from ISPs. Don't let Tom Wheeler's history with ISPs undercut the FCC's willingness to treat the businesses it's charged with regulating objectively. Preserve Net Neutrality.

Please keep the internet available the way it is for everybody. Its a great help for school students, I was given greif in high school because my mom could not afford one. I have a daughter in school and a daughter who has not even started yet. The internet has helped my 10 year old a great deal already for school work. I use the internet sometimes every day to keep in touch with friends and relatives who live very far away that I never get to see. At times its our only way of communicating because we may not always have a phone on.

The idea of a pay-to-play Internet is ludicrous. The SCOTUS has given our election system over to the highest bidder, the concept of allowing that same high bidder being able to direct or impede general access to something as vital to all of us as the Internet is certainly misguided.

The Internet should be managed as a public utility not as the private platform of the wealthiest.

The internet needs to be open and available without restrictions to everyone not just giant corporations that buy their way in everything. If it is restricted then nobody can really have a chance to get information and voice an opinion on matters of government.

Dear Federal Communications Commission:

Please keep the internet free and open to everyone - for now and for always! Don't let big corporations destroy online commerce, and crush every individual's right to freedom of information, networking and so much more. I am counting on you to crush this proposal, and prevent the passage of any future ones.

I believe that the internet is the most important thing in mankind's evolution since we discovered how to use fire. It allows us to communicate, to share stories and empathize with each other, and is pushing our society to its next level of evolution. Something this important and valuable cannot be allowed to be destroyed for ANY company's self-interest, or even a large group of companies. If the open internet becomes the closed internet, there will be a backlash of monumental proportions, and people will fight, for years if needed, to get it back.

Please don't let it come to that, and keep the internet free and open.

Honorable Commissioner Tom Wheeler,

I am sending you this message to express my support for Net Neutrality. I strongly oppose the proposal to allow ISP's to establish a fast lane FOR ANY PURPOSE.

This nothing more than a naked cash grab on their part and is completely unnecessary. I strongly urge you to reject this proposal and join the rest of the world in open internet access.

Dear FCC,

I am a retiree and have seen my utilities double since I retired. I rely on the internet to keep in touch with friends, order things (so I don't have to go out in bad weather and drive all over), and to research information and keep up to date on current events. I don't want to have to pick only a few websites that I can afford and miss out on being able to learn about what else is out there. Perhaps get a recipe from a little visited blog, or whatever I want.

I want the internet to be a level playing field that I have access to. My dad was a ham radio operator, and he always told me that the people own the airways and that the radio stations and tv stations only get to use them. We, the people, still do own the airways. Don't give them over as a profit center to the big corporations.

Thanks for reading and considering the negative effect that this give away will have on many citizens.

A sine qua non of a free society is the democratic access to information. Net neutrality must be secured and maintained. The United States of America must not become a repressive dictatorship where every wall has ears and each of our writings and actions is monitored. We all know that the merging of corporate interests and national interests means fascism.

Subject: Save Net Neutrality!

Please don't allow big telecom companies to decide who benefits from fast internet speed. Internet neutrality is an important key in moving forward with equality in education--at home, at school--and in the work force.

Dear FCC,
do not hasten our race to oligarchy by allowing separate pay to play tiers of internet service. help retain the democracy we teach children that we stand for. Innovation will occur regardless of fees accrued by paying for tiered internet access becuase company's are completely opaque about why services cost what they charge. the interent is a utility and should be regulatde as such

Tom Wheeler

Dear Chaiman Wheeler:

I am writing today to urge you to reject Chairman Tom Wheeler's proposal to allow internet service providers (ISP) to charge different rates for faster access to websites willing to pay, or to allow any discretion on the part of ISPs to manage the flow of information on the internet based on who the information provider is, or their willingness to pay for access.

The internet was founded on the principle of net neutrality. And the success of that principle speaks for itself. There is no reason to allow ISPs to manage the flow of information on the internet to maximize their profits to the detriment of every other stakeholder in the internet.

Please reject Chairman Wheeler's proposal, and any other proposal that diverges from the principle of net neutrality.

Sincerely,

Anna Ronzetti

Title II of the Communications Act of 1934 already grants you the authority to declare the internet a public utility and provide greater regulation to the telecommunications industry. It's long past time to declare the internet a utility.

Dear Mr. Chief Commissioner,

If the proposal for a fast lane internet goes through it will give corporate internet giants power to control access to information.

That would amount to net censorship and curb freedom of speech. If there is potential for it, it will happen.

Please do not let this proposal threaten one of our fundamental rights. Please nip it in the bud before it grows into a web of corruption.

Please draw a line in the sand against rampant corporatization and against inequality of access and opportunity. Do not allow the Internet to become just another realm where "might makes right(er)." We are fed up with being marginalized, disrespected, shunted onto a slower track and ignored if we aren't super-rich. It's fundamentally un-American. Not the Internet, too.

I'm extremely dissapointeed on the FCC plan vote to kill net neutrality. Over the course of the years we've observe the havoc, fraud and the disavantage high speed trading had brought in the finacial market to the point that the federal government is presently considering alternatives. Taking away net neutrality would create that same scenario on every aspect of the internet where in order for you to compete, to get your point across or to innovate would depends on your financial means.

To Chairman Tom Wheeler and the FCC Commissioners—

FCC—

The 21st century internet is an integral part of our economy, democracy, and communication systems. America is absolutely dependent on an open internet operating on net neutrality principles.

As such, you have an obligation to regulate it as a utility. Please assert your Title II authority, and stop trying to appease the telecom giants at the expense of everyone else.

Subject: Save Net Neutrality!

Many internet users are using their ability to access information and facts, and others, in our quests to do business, to do research, and to communicate with others. If the internet becomes closed . . . to most of us . . . we cannot and will not be able to do anything at all. Our businesses, research, and much more will be nearly non-existent for us, but will be there strictly for wealthy corporations who can afford the excessive fees for "pay for play". For me, and most of the rest of us who are not wealthy corporations, it will mean the end of computer use as we now know it.

We need the internet to be as free as possible for us all. It is better if we consider our internet to be as a PUBLIC UTILITY, much as our telephones have been. small businesses will be lost, and only huge corporations will win all and the rest of us will lose big time. This will also mean that these few corporations will only have themselves to compete with, and they will eventually lose to one monopoly. We have enough monopolies in everything, let us have competitive and free internet.

Thank you for your consideration!

Subject: Net Neutrality - One professional's thoughts... for what they're worth

Dear Sirs and Madams of our FCC governing body,

I read online you were open to public feedback on the upcoming decisions on net neutrality so if indeed you are I would like to voice one such opinion. As a professional in the IT industry and a user of the internet almost since its conception, I feel I have a good insight into its workings. The current bill/act that awaits your approval or denial will profoundly impact our future and have a dominion effect on almost every aspect of life from education to industry in ways you can only imagine. It will also set the precedence for anything proposed similarly in the future.

When you get past the political fluff and all the legal speak and deal with the technology itself what's being proposed benefits service providers and their stock holders directly and only them. The internet has become the home phone, TV, and preferred form of communication (for better or worse) for most of this country's citizenship. Just as I'm e-mailing you from my computer, I can go into the next room and the home phone is connected via an internet connection using voice over IP (VoIP), the TV box is a network device, home security, and even some new kitchen appliances are connected to make life easier. Even my car e-mails me when it's in need of an oil change or has low tire pressure. All these things are the natural evolution of communication that started with the phone system. Historically communications have been seen as "services" and the providers of those services are simply that.

What's being proposed allows the service providers to restrict, filter, resale, up-sale, and extort those both using their service and communicating across the services they provide, not to mention invading the privacy of those using their services by monitoring the data in order to charge for it. If they're allowed to do this it will impact the home life's of millions, the educational institutions and access the students have outside of school, and last but far from least the economics of many that depend on the open access of the internet to do their jobs and take care of their families. The reality is the companies that are pushing for this couldn't care less about any of that no matter the nice words they use in public forms (their actions speak very clearly), they're doing this purely because they're seeing dollar signs, as are their stock holders. At the end of the day if the internet providers are allowed to set up data toll roads and change businesses fees because they send data over the wires to customers, who do you think is going to "really" cover that cost? I'll have to pay it because they'll charge me more to cover their costs (even if that's not exactly what they say, that's just business). Netflix is already preparing to raise their prices to cover it. Think about each service that will raise their costs to cover these fees that have NEVER been legal in any other form of communication historically. The damage will cascade throughout the industry and everything will incase in cost, but you can bet the cost of internet won't go down.

Are you aware that current research shows that the US already pays exorbitant costs compared to the rest of the world for their internet connections? (Here's an article: The Daily Dot: US Horrible Internet<<http://www.dailydot.com/business/new-america-foundation-internet-speed-cost/>>... there's a rather lengthy list of articles just like this if you do a quick search on Google.com.) It's due to companies being allowed to strangle innovation and competition via cost, local policy, and the use of political groups like yourselves. After all there's no reason to progress a technology if it's the best worst solution anyone has access to in an area. From small town groups to state and national level politicians they've all been used to bolster profits and protect monopolies that would have been illegal 20 years ago via the same political groups and fair competition laws. I'm really not sure what changed, but the differences have been eye opening and appalling. Didn't Bell Labs get disbanded for less than Time Warner and Comcast have done in the last few months? Instead companies like Comcast AT&T and Verizon are leading the charge to further fortify their monopolies. Where I live is a prime example; I reside in the city of Raleigh NC, and many of us are waiting on ANYONE to come in that gives us a high speed option other than Time Warner/Comcast. Any group that has tried (from what I've read and been told) has been politically blocked or told no. I've seen it firsthand when Sprint was going to offer fiber connections to my neighborhood with higher speed internet connections and Time Warner (now Comcast) blocked them with the local policies. Google is currently in talks with our city/town, but the fact that has taken over a month now to discuss and confirm the details about something that a vast number of the local populous want shows what a hold these companies have on our regulators. I know this isn't just happening here, but it shouldn't be happening anywhere.

I sincerely hope you'll make your decision favoring the large number of people that depend on you to do the right thing for all of us rather than just the corporations that more often than not use their money to influence decisions for the benefit of furthering their greed. Haven't we all seen enough of how that ends for all of us and our families in the last decade? Please let this be a turning point that brings some balance back to the equation.

Kind regards,
Matt Horn

Stop this. Just stop.
Stop pretending that you don't know allowing any favoritism or disparity in internet service will absolutely result in an abuse of those rules. These companies make billions for a reason, they know how to manipulate any rule to their favor, and they already have every tactic possible, every loophole already planned out and are just waiting for you to present whatever flawed plan that will arise from this. It won't take 5 minutes before whatever "bulletproof" plan you concoct is torn to shreds.
No laws can be written perfectly, and indeed even the laws in place now are attacked constantly, and broken quite often. But they deliver a very clear message, that everyone will be given equal access regardless of the depth of their pocketbooks, anything less than that very clear stance will be rent asunder by these corporate juggernauts who are already enjoying perfect regional monopolies, they absolutely don't need more power than they already have.
Thank you for your time,

The United States has seen too many government policies, which allow the rich corporation to keep on increasing there profits at the expense of ordinary citizens. The tax loopholes given to major corporation, while our own military personel have to settle for a 1% pay increase all in the name of balancing the budget. Now again we are considering giving control of internet speed to the very corporations that will profit from these changes at the expense of the low and middle class. Enough is enough. If government can not decide on an equable tax code for all. Why should a government agency be allow to decide that big telecom should be able to decide who gets the greater internet speed and bandwidth at the expense of those that cannot afford this. Keep the internet free and open to all citizens.

Richard (Coyle) writes:

Dear Chairman Wheeler:

As a retired old "techie" who still provides trouble-shooting advice to my family on digital hardware and software, I'm very concerned about the recent approval to consider paid priority on the internet. As a consumer of internet services since they first appeared in basic phone modem form, I've watched the monopolistic practices of the major providers stall the expanse of high speed broadband to the general public, while providing substantially faster speeds to those who can afford it. In general, our country is stalled at speeds of under 10mbps on average, while much less developed countries are providing much higher broadband speeds to the masses. IMHO, allowing media providers to purchase faster access won't solve any problem, if the consumer's service can't accommodate the higher speed anyway. What needs to be done is establish a baseline broadband speed that all ISP's must provide that is sufficient to access most web content, and then allow the end user to purchase higher speed s to access the additional content that is necessary to achieve their goal. That way, the media providers all have an even playing field on which to enter the arena, one that will allow for most content to be consumed in a real-time fashion. Then it's up to the consumer to pay for any high speed access they desire that is over and above the norm, with standardized pricing among ISPs for all access, so markets are fairly priced. This has been the way our consumer markets for utility services have functioned successfully for decades and should serve us well into the future, without allowing the monopolistic activities of the past. Please consider this approach seriously. Thank you.

To the FCC——

Please build any net neutrality argument upon solid legal standing. Specifically, this means reclassifying broadband under Title II of the Telecommunications Act of 1934.

706 authority from the Telecommunications Act has been repeatedly struck down in court after legal challenges by telecom companies. Take the appropriate steps to prevent this from happening again.

You say you want to foster competition and new technologies, but the end of Net Neutrality would negate that. The Internet is the one place we can all have a chance at success at our purpose, regardless of starting position. Signing up for this corporate plan would be like signing up to only go to parts of a city! From an economic view, it makes no sense to limit what a consumer is likely to see since that limits their spending. Thank you for keeping our internet neutral!

In this high tech era, net neutrality is not an issue of commerce, it is an issue of freedom of speech. To constrict the right to be heard by placing economic prowess as the prerequisite to be heard is to stifle innovation and more importantly opens the door to censorship and totalitarian rule.

Although this will be debated by commercial entities trying to protect and increase their profits, the masses rely on the FCC to protect our constitutional rights no matter how the medium may change. To overlook the profundity of this decision and its potential negative impact is net neutrality is not preserved is to shirk one's own humanity.

My request is to please recognize this issue for what it really is, see the major downstream implications and make sure to defend net neutrality.

Sincerely,

As with almost all other efforts to avoid regulation or de-regulate, this is a way to further the distance between the wealthy and the rest of us. To gain additional profits at the expense of the public. The internet, phone lines, airspace and physical property that's not privatized all have something in common. They are supposed to be owned by the People Of The United States. Access fees are already restrictive. Now, we are asked to pay even more to maintain useful speed of access and content at the same time that the people asking for the permission to charge us are also asking to avoid new laws to avoid having to pay people working wages. NO! No more "premium services" for corporations while the rest of us have to use whatever is left over. Maintain equal access with equal speeds for all users where ever possible. Any rep that would vote against declaring this a utility is a rep that should never get another vote.

Subject: Net Neutrality
Good Evening Mr. Wheller.

I wanted to email you with my thoughts about your proposal in regards to Net Neutrality.
I dont like it.

I think the idea of providing companies a way of getting a fast pass to better internet access is a terrible idea. The fact that big buisness' and CEO's like your proposal should be a huge red flag, because i believe it is in their best interest to make money, not help people. They will do whatever it takes to make money, and if that means charging people more for a service that we should have equal access to they will do it. I understand that prioritization isn't a bad word, but in some situations it is unnecesary. Obviously you prioritize in finances, do i have money to eat out today? or should i pay my car payment instead? These are daily decisions, those are things you have to prioritize. If you dont then you dont get a car, you dont have access to a car then. But i dont see the internet as soemthing that you should have to make that decision. Think of doctors, what if they have a life or death scenario and they need to send an email that could save someones life, and a company decides that they dont have this, "fast lane" so who knows if that email will get where it needs to be in time. or whatever scenario works best for you. If you see a man and a woman drowning in the ocean, do you prioritze to save one or the other. No, you do what you can so save both, because both lives are precious. You don't prioritize people's lives, and you shouldnt force people to prioritize their money for a thing they should have equal access to. Everyone shoule have equal access. What about homeschooled kids of families of low income that dont have the money to prioritize internet. Do you realize how crucial the internet has become in education? (Im sure you do, i dont mean to be insulting) What about college students (Like me) Doing research for a paper, and I'm getting terrible service because my provider decided i am not a priority. What will that do to my education. This is just a ridiculous idea, that some people should have better access than others, and incredibly unfair and unjust, and just plain mean. Please reconsider this proposal. I mean they have always said, if it isnt broken dont fix it. Maybe thats what you should do. Nothing. Thanks for you time.

Attempting to kill Net Neutrality is an attempt to kill freedom and openness - democratic principles. Therefore, this is an attempt by behemoth corporate monopolies to usurp our democracy and control every aspect of it. Their objectives are to control, censor, block, slow down, and disable certain websites, and "increase profits by giving the rich better Internet access than everyone else." (DFA) They have plenty of money for expansion. They just need to stop sitting on $trillions and offshoring $billions into tax havens.

America has always prided itself on the pursuit of equality. By ending Net Neutrality we are encouraging Fortune 500 businesses to continually take advantage of not only their consumers but snuff out the competition before it could even form. I thought we were supposed to have "laws" that protected to public from this since obviously our elected officials are failing miserably.

Having any sort of unbalance is doomed to create negativity in something as well loved and useful to mankind as the internet. Equal sharing of internet speed is only fair and it should be obvious. My internet is already slow. I don't believe for a second that the higher ups are not trying to destroy the internet for the average American. If there is any sort of backlash from no net neutrality, it will be the corporations and governments fault. We Americans can be pretty stupid but not THAT stupid. Don't mess with our way of life any more than you already have.

The fact that the internet has been open and free is one of the greatest testaments to our nation's value of those doctrines. For it to be anything else would be for us to follow in the footsteps of China, North Korea, and many countries in the middle east, where what information is readily available to the consumer is blocked and controlled by the government and corporations.

a FEW YEARS AGO the Bolivians told Bechtel corporation to get the hell out of their country. The CEOs said that all water in Bolivia, including rain water, belonged to them so they could bottle it and sell it. It is time to kick these CEOs out of our internet and make it clear that they will never own the air, the sun and the water, which belong to everybody.

The freedom of the internet is one of the greatest things about the internet and if you add a price its not longer free. You don't pay for the information you can find in a library why should you pay for the information you can find online. If this passes in favor of these companies and not the people you are basically destroying knowledge itself.

The internet must remain an equal playing field. ISPs must NOT be able to pick and choose who gets the bandwidth and who does not. Even if a company cannot speed up its own subsidiaries, if others are allowed to pay for better service on the internet, then new entrepreneurs will be at an extreme disadvantage. KEEP THE INTERNET OPEN !

This proposal is clearly not in the interest of The People. It's disturbing that the FCC is engaged with such imbalanced corporate pandering in the 1st place. The internet is a tool and a resource that connects us to knowledge, information, and most importantly, each other. DO NOT turn over the decision about who gets it to corporate interests. They are not in alignment with the needs of people. They are in alignment with power and profits for themselves.

To whom is may concern at the FCC,

The internet is an extremely important tool in our world, not only for communication but also for information. With net neutrality intact it acts like a collective brain for humanity allowing us each to make our own neural pathways and choose those that are most relevant individually. With a loss of net neutrality instead of a collective brain the internet will eventually become a collective funnel leaving small ideas, businesses, perspectives out of the stream lacking the ability to become visible and gain traction therefore crippling the growth of ideas and it's usefulness as a tool. We have Soooo much media editing and promotional tailoring already. The companies/people with the most money already can garner the most attention. Why destroy people's choice in making the next big idea or product or company- big? Leaving only the current big players in control of All the information? Humanity is not stagnant our collective world wide brain storm shouldn't be either. In this information age, net neutrality is paramount to free speech and society as a whole.

Ps I'm a 32 year old entrepreneur in Colorado.

The Internet is clearly NOT just an information service. It is a 2-way communications service. I believe the FCC normally refers to that as a "Common Carrier", which the FCC has the power to regulate. The FCC can decide whether to maintain a level playing field for all, or to give giant corporations an advantage over innovative startups. The choice is in your hands.

An equal Internet is so vital to small businesses, research, and innovation, and thus to our economy and jobs. How can sabotaging this great tool for good even be under consideration? Please please keep it equal.

As a government organization the FCC should be protecting the best interests of the United States as a whole. The proposal to allow ISPs to transfer data for different entities at different rates given how much the entities pay is COMPLETELY counter to the interests of the vast majority of businesses and citizens, and of the government itself.

Please act with wisdom, and do what is right.

Thank you.

The Internet has always been a level playing field for anyone to put out content, creativity, innovation and information. It's what's made independent media outlets like Democracy Now! reach a massive audience that would otherwise be relegated to choosing from corporate media channels like Fox News. It's the lifeline that allows small innovators to create a service that reaches almost everyone on the globe. But the FCC's proposal could kill this Internet democracy.

To the FCC-----

Please build any net neutrality argument upon solid legal standing. Specifically, this means reclassifying broadband under Title II of the Telecommunications Act of 1934.

706 authority from the Telecommunications Act has been repeatedly struck down in court after legal challenges by telecom companies. Take the appropriate steps to prevent this from happening again.

No throttling the internet and calling it the fast lane. Corporate policy does not reflect the consumers best interests, nor does it reflect humanities best interests. These telcos and cable companies need to upgrade the system instead of throttle it and slice it into pay to play. They were deregulated back in the 90s to allow them to make money in return for connecting the US with High Speed broadband, not low speed barley meets the definition of broadband "served areas". They are thieves and greedy cheats and they did not make the internet. Tax payers funded the internet. The tier 3 provider knows that the 5 major US companies are refusing to upgrade their equipment and it is causing congestion and problems related to peering. Anything less than classifying these guys as common carriers is a crime against the tax payers.

The United States has been a joke to the rest of the world when it comes to connectivity. Outside of the illegal NSA dragnets and compromised security in the name of fear mongering politicians and corporations looking to cash in on war and surveillance. Many other countries pay a lot less for internet and have way faster service spanning their whole county.

If the FCC can't do its job and protect the tax payer then it is no longer necessary for this nation. All your funding should be cut and you should be jailed for failing to protect civil rights of consumers.

To My Friends and Fellow Humans at the F.C.C.!

I am well aware that money talks in this society. Even though my desire for a free and open internet is a noble and indeed beautiful vision, it in reality does nothing to line the pockets of the few who are running large enterprises in this treacherous sea of greed we call capitalism. So I expect this brief note to be received and unread by a digital bureaucracy that has thousands of filters in place. Maybe a few key words will be scanned and logged by some Harvard algorithm. At any rate, I do implore for common decency to triumph in this time of unconscious greed. Don't let AT&T, Bright House Networks, Cablevision, CenturyLink, Charter, Comcast, Cox, Frontier, Suddenlink, Time Warner Cable and the rest dictate our future as networked country. Is it not our responsibility as 21st Century people, to look out for the best interests of the whole, rather than the select few. After all, access to the internet is growing more and more necessary for partaking in the movements of society. If we hide the internet behind walls of money and restrict the flow of information from one to another, we will stifle the spirit of cooperation and betray the freedoms we so strongly cherish. Please act on behalf of your human family all around you. AT&T and those other guys are just being dicks.

Sir,

I write to voice my opinion that there should only be one speed offered to everyone. This is no different than the cable companies claiming that by buying up each other and merging consumers will get more and better service. In the last 50 years this has always proved to be false. Consumers get slower speeds, less innovation and higher prices every time, and less content and choices. If you allow for different speeds then the playing field will not be equal, fair or even. This will stifle creativity and innovation within every field and lead to gross inequalities. In the future if this is allowed we will see even more problems and no doubt lawsuits because companies will not deliver as per their contracts.

Subject: Terrible decision!

I already pay Comcast for internet access. IT IS there job to provide that connectivity! I am PAYING FOR AND ASKING Hulu, Netflix, and iTunes to stream content to ME! OVER the internet connection I am PAYING FOR with the INTENT to do precisely THAT!

I wouldn't care if there was competition, if I had choice, but I don't! Conveniently, cable companies have monopolies where they provide services. So unless you are brining an alternative to my market, Portland Oregon, I resent your recent failure to regulate Comcast! DSL and WIFI broadband in my area are inferior, and I have no fiber optic provider.

Comcast internet IS a utility. The internet has stopped being a luxury in the same way we think of electricity. Would it be right for the electric company to add a surcharge for providing electricity 24 hrs? Something they are already expected to do?

I already pay Comcast, it is wrong for them to 'double dip', and that's exactly what they are doing thanks to your failure to regulate a monopoly. iTunes and Hulu streaming have been having problems the day after 'net neutrality' was overturned in court.

Comcast is charging me for 'unlimited' 25Mbit/s connection to the internet, and that's what I deserve to get regardless if it's a file download or Netflix stream! Why is this even a debate?!

FCC is suppose to protect the consumers, not to allow big businesses paid privileges. this is extremely shameful on you guys. i am surprised that Republicans are the ones sided against this proposal while Democrats are for it.

this is your way of telling us it's ok to have equal treatment so long as you pay for it. "separate but equal" sound familiar?

shameful and i am extremely disappointed.

Subject: Do Not End Net Neutrality

To: Chairman Wheeler and the rest of the Federal Communications Commission,

How sad! While Brazil, a country that just half a century ago was dominated by a fascist military dictatorship, has passed an "internet bill of rights," the US FCC is capitulating to moneyed interests in the US. Excuse me if I believe that hiding behind a wrong-headed court ruling is an excuse for capitulation, but the consequences of this are likely to be serious.

Today most searches are accomplished using a search engine of what was once an upstart and is not a major corporation. How likely is it that such a company could fight on the uneven playing field that the FCC wants to create?

For that matter, how likely is it that any of us who rely on the internet for essential information and not entertainment provided by major corporations with fists full of cash who will now grab bandwidth stand a chance? What the FCC proposes is the equivalent of raising the bar to entry for new and small businesses -- and that stifles creativity, concentrates wealth, and destroys any remaining pretense that the US is the land of the free where anyone can make it.

At least, I suppose the Commission is being honest in recognizing the death of equality in a country increasingly dominated by money and special interests. I lament the contempt that this decision shows for entrepreneurs and small businesses everywhere. It would be encouraging to believe that the FCC would reconsider its position.

Subject: Open Internet

Dear FCC,

I currently work for a technology firm. As you can imagine, the threats to the Open Internet are not only a personal concern but also for our business. I cannot stress how important it is to keep service providers from changing the way data is handled. All data should be treated as the same. Prioritizing how quickly I can access data from "Non Prime Sources" will cripple competition and be a serious threat to the democratizing affects of the internet.

I can speak for myself and all my colleagues. Net Neutrality is vitality important to us, don't mess it up. We need more competition from service providers. In my area we only have one viable choice for high speed internet. If we had this competition, the threats to net neutrality would not be so great. Only having one provider (Comcast in my case) gives them far to much control over the most important means of communication and business infrastructure created in the last 100 years.

WE NEED NET NEUTRALITY!

Please - just do what is right, uphold the intent of the FCC! Fair access to the internet serves the public interest. The FCC is legally designed to serve the public interest. The last thing we, the public, need or the administration will want as a legacy, is another bowing down by our government to a very select and definitely non-public corporate sector. We want, we deserve, we need net neutrality.

If anything, we should make the internet more open, not less. Broadband should be treated like a telecom or a utility. The pipes should be open and be able to be leased by other parties, so consumers have the option to choose the best service at the best price. Bandwidth should not be throttled based on how much a content providing company pays. That would cause an unfair trade practice for start-ups. It should remain consumer driven. If I want faster access, I should be able to pay for it. It should not be based on where I go on the internet. America as a society will be hurt, if internet content is controlled by a few. If the ISP's want to create their pay for play internet, they should then also be required to establish another internet with greater bandwidth that will be free (as in freedom) and open for all.

I believe 100% net neutrality is best for growth and development of new technologies, ideas, and the economy. Where I currently live I have only 2 choices for broadband internet: DSL (max speed 3 Mbps for ~$50 month) and Wireless (3-12Mbps and cost $35-$50). The problem is that neither works well, and both are overpriced. However, there is no real competition and therefore no progress or development. I would prefer if ISPs were classified as common carriers and then they would be forced to treat me like all their other customers.

These proposed rules will break the Internet as we know it. It will allow ISP's to charge any fee they want to any content source for adequate bandwidth and provide for unfair business practices by letting ISP's that also provide content, to charge fees on any other content provider.

I honestly do not understand who anyone could support your proposed rules. It is blatantly obvious this will end horrendously into a tiered pay to play Internet, instead of the open environment it is today.

Please do not go down in history as the people who destroyed the Internet.

The new rules by Wheeler will hurt the internet. I fail to see the point of supporting bad laws instead of fighting for good ones.

And perhaps the best evidence in support of the internet being a vital utility (such as telecommunications) instead of as a commodity is the actions of the FCC itself. Instead of using tele-communication (phones) to contact the FCC to comment on the new rules, use the internet instead (write an e-mail).

Please build any net neutrality argument upon solid legal standing. Specifically, this means reclassifying broadband under Title II of the Telecommunications Act of 1934.

Subject: Ban Paid Prioritization
Neutral (adjective) 2. Belonging to neither of two specified, implied or usual categories; occupying a middle position with regard to two extremes; indifferent, impartial, dispassionate (Oxford English Dictionary).

Chairman Wheeler,

I live in a small town. When doing home improvement projects, I am generally only able to choose from items sold by Home Depot. I have become indescribably frustrated by knowing that products of a higher quality, that perform better and will last longer, exist for purchase, but I do not have access to purchasing them because the smaller local retailers are too small to be able to maintain an extensive inventory.

Similarly, my options for internet provider and delivery are limited. It is neither fast nor cheap, and the customer service is deplorable. I do not want my options further reduced by what my provider prioritizes or by which corporations pay enough for faster delivery. I already know about giant retailers who can "pay to play," like Amazon, Target, et cetera; I want all retailers/information sources/media to be available to me, for me to make my own decisions about what I consume.

I know you have said you are committed to "net neutrality." Unless paid prioritization is specifically disallowed, who or what is to prevent it? If you are for net neutrality, then ban paid prioritization. That action will ensure content delivery remains "neutral" as defined above: indifferent and impartial.

Sincerely,
Rebekah L Davis

The modern economy would collapse without the internet and American life would be extraordinarily disrupted. It's a simple fact that the internet is a public utility, not a private service. It's time we regulated it as such.

It is also the last avenue for freedom of speech. Putting corporations in charge of the Net means there will be political control and the kind of propaganda now distributed by Fox News.

If you vote against keeping the Internet neutral, you are denying all Americans freedom of speech and that you are in the pockets of multi-national corporations who have already corrupted our country for their own purposes of greed and control.

Subject: Internet Openness

It is completely outrageous that the FCC is caving to the demands of Internet Service Providers. The proposed rule will allow ISPs to charge users for faster access to certain websites. This drastically cuts competition, and will allow ISPs to essentially extort customers if they want to actually access their favorite websites at a reasonable speed, such as YouTube or Netflix.

ISPs in the United States have already stolen tens of billions of dollars of tax payer money for infrastructure upgrades they never completed, proving that they cannot be trusted. So why is the FCC allowing them to start stealing directly from U.S. Citizens now? You've received tens of thousands of comments, thousands of phone calls and hundreds of letters from people against this plan, yet you continue to ignore them.

Internet service providers need to be reclassified as Title 2 Common Carriers to protect the interests of the citizens of The United States.

Thanks for your time.

This would be more accurate if called Internet freedom.

The internet should be treated just as the public infrastructure is treated, as public domain and equally open to all.

The idea that if we allow companies to make "fast lanes" without impacting the current internet is something even a 3rd grader can figure out is a galaxy sized load of treason pie. Companies will use the death of neutrality in order to proceed with their plans to charge people for the pipes, the speed and then the very data bits while charging them for a 4th time as a "multiple fee" fee.

Chairman Wheeler,

As a student, an engineer, and someone who understands the power of information, I am deeply troubled at the way the FCC is handling net neutrality. Butchering may be a better word, but incendiary language gets us no where.

You and your fellow commissioners are limiting competition, and aiding in the creation of a monopoly in the internet and information service industry. ISP's should be classified as common carriers, or their divisions should be separated from their larger companies as AT&T, Comcast, and other companies all have a vested interest in their own content, which competes with other services available on the internet. Internet which ISP's now have the ability to throttle, make unusable, or otherwise price out their competition to support their own content. It simply is unreasonable, and indefensible, the methods and actions taken by the FCC to cater and coddle to the ISP and telecom companies.

I hope you find it prudent to classify all ISP's as common carriers, and if they are not common carriers, then their protection under the DMCA should be null.

A deeply concerned citizen,

Dear FCC,

I am writing to oppose rules that will allow for discrimination on the Internet - where the wealthy can purchase faster Internet service and everyone else continues to have slower service.

I do not want telecom giants and wealthy Internet companies to determine the future of the Internet. I want new ideas to flourish on the Internet and not be blocked because they do not have sufficient funds to purchase fast service and compete.

I do not want the Internet to be turned into another vehicle that allows money to flow from working Americans to the wealthiest -- where web-based services like Netflix purchase faster service and pass the costs on to consumers.

The proposal being considered would kill rather than protect Net Neutrality and allow rampant discrimination online. The Internet should be viewed as a public good and should be operated consistent with our rights to Freedom of Speech and Freedom of the Press. Turning the Internet into a pay to play scheme is unacceptable.

Creating a tiered internet that favors some traffic at the expense of other data hurts innovation and consumers, serving only to benefit large corporations seeking to rewrite the rules for financial gain. The internet is an essential part of the modern economy and the US is falling well behind other countries in terms of speed and price thanks to local monopolies removing competition and incentives to innovate and provide better service. Internet service providers should be classified as common carriers in order to protect access and ensure the internet remains open to all instead of increasingly limited to those with the influence to get the rules changed in their favor.

The ISP's already have a monopoly in most areas leaving most people without an option to choose for internet. So they settle and they lose, a lot. They pay obscene amounts of money for incredibly slow speeds and are told, "This is the fastest speed we offer, for the best price." We both know this is not true, "i.e. Google Fiber", and if the ISP's are allowed to bottleneck companies who don't pay them "a little something extra, for my trouble" is going to severely harm the small businesses, artists and musicians, and more importantly, The Free and Open Internet. To: Chairman Wheeler and the rest of the Federal Communications Commission,

This country continues to fall behind in terms of income equality, freedom of expression, personal privacy and economic opportunity. Everywhere I look I see large corporate oligopolies dominating our domestic markets leading to noncompetitive pricing for access to products and services - cell phone subscriptions and cable and satellite packages being prime examples. Now the FCC is going to burden Internet users access to the Internet on behalf of corporate behemoths like Verizon? Excuse me, is it really the FCC's mission to benefit corporate America ... or its citizens?

HERE ARE YOUR BULLET POINTS:

- Promoting competition, innovation and investment in broadband services and facilities
- Supporting the nation's economy by ensuring an appropriate competitive framework for the unfolding of the communications revolution
- Encouraging the highest and best use of spectrum domestically and internationally
- Revising media regulations so that new technologies flourish alongside diversity and localism
- Providing leadership in strengthening the defense of the nation's communications infrastructure

I am deeply concerned and gravely disappointed that the FCC would propose rules that would allow "pay for priority" in any form when considering the net neutrality issue. Allowing for ANY situation in which an Internet service provider (ISP's) can charge content companies for faster and more reliable delivery of their traffic is appalling. In a free and accessible internet, ISP's should be prevented from holding content hostage for higher fees. ISP's already charge customers to deliver this content. They should not then be allowed to charge content companies on the other end as well. This will result in unfair cost increases to consumers. This will also provide unfair advantage to established companies with deep pockets at the expense of smaller innovative companies.

I urge the FCC to reconsider. Any such deal that allows pay for priority should be banned as it results in performance extortion.

I'm not sure how you think it's in any way helpful to the American people to allow Comcast and other anti-consumer corporations to throttle traffic from their competitors, or anyone they think will pay up. Traffic is limited artificially - the internet is not some congested highway where companies that need faster speeds for their business are being held up by traffic from everyone else. Everyone can get the same speeds - throttling one thing doesn't make another thing go faster.

Providing a method for ISPs to create a "fast lane" just allows them to control how their consumers experience the services of other companies. That's a problem in itself; but what about Comcast vs. Netflix? Comcast has *already* tried to make customers use NBC's streaming services by only counting non-comcast sites against their customers' bandwidth limits. How much worse will it get if they can also throttle Netflix to 56k speeds?

I'm tired of telling people that our internet service in America competes with internet service in third world countries. You should be buckling down on companies like Comcast, not giving them more power.

Reader,

Classify Internet Service Providers under Title II.

The internet already has "fast lanes". Any content provider and any ISP can enter a peering agreement ( which includes price, throughput, capacity, speed, quality of service, etc) with one another.

Consumers are sold connectivity "up to X speeds". This doesnt mean they're guarenteed X speed - just a speeds "up to" X. It can - and often is fractions or percents of X that a consumer typically experiences. ISP's will use this loophole to discriminate on traffic from content providers who have not paid for "fast lanes".

Content providers already pay for the bandwidth they use to their ISP. These rules changes would be forcing content providers to pay twice.

If an ISP (whom own many content properties) have competing services, they'll raise the price of the "fast lane" from their competitor. Verizon owns Redbox, Comcast owns a large chunk of Hulu. These services are wont be charged for "fast lanes" - while Netflix and Amazon will.

To the Chairman and Commission:

I'm writing today to express my dismay at the news that the FCC is considering new rules and regulations which would allow Internet Service Providers to exercise control over internet speeds. The internet as it has existed for the past few decades has been a driving force for the 21st-century economy. That growth has been propagated on the free flow of information unimpeded by outside influence.

For the Commission to assume that these new rules will not result in abuse is absurd. It gives far too much power over content delivery to ISPs which already have a terrible customer service record across the board. These new rules will fundamentally alter the way information is exchanged online, giving top priority only to those businesses or organizations which are willing to "foot the bill". This not only gives large corporations and political organizations an unfair edge in the digital marketplace, it will serve to begin the gentrification of the internet, turning it into a marketplace controlled by an ever-shrinking minority.

To implement what the FCC is considering is to begin the slow, deliberate destruction of a free and prosperous internet, placing it in the pocket of the political and economic elite. It should belong to the people.

Subject: In support of net neutrality
To whom it may concern,

The FCC's latest proposal to allow internet 'fast lanes' threatens to undermine the entire foundation of the internet. The internet was built on the principle of free, open, and equal access to information. Yet if the practice of 'pay for priority' becomes commonplace, that will no longer be the case. If only wealthy entities can afford to pay internet service providers for the privilege of priority, the internet will become a walled garden - the authorized content of those services who have paid their dues within, and the rest outside, still existent but frustrating to use and difficult to access.

In fact, this process has already begun. In light of Verizon's court victory in January, Verizon customers found their Netflix service to be degrading in quality, compromised by errors and video that seemed to be streaming at speeds far below what they were paying Verizon for. It transpired that Netflix's performance on the connections of Verizon customers had been dropping for months - and yet, after Netflix struck a deal with Verizon to pay a fee in exchange for a more favorable peering arrangement, those same performance metrics began to improve. It reached a similar deal with Comcast, after which Netflix performance for Comcast customers improved by as much as 65%. This is a clear snapshot of the kind of future we can expect without a neutral Net: if you have the money to pay the toll, you'll be fine. If you don't, then too bad for you and the people who want your service.

If the internet loses its neutrality, it will be a loss for innovation. It was the openness of the net that spurred its massive growth in the 90s, and resulted in the plethora of services we have today. If they had had to pay for priority, there is a very real chance that they would have been snuffed out in their infancy, abandoned by internet users for established, wealthy services with faster connections. We would still have AOL, but we wouldn't have Google or Yahoo. Independent websites and startups would suffer, unable to pay the tolls, and thus throttled by the ISPs. To say nothing of the alarming implications for free speech and censorship. If ISPs have license to throttle services as they see fit, it would be alarmingly easy for them to shape access to information, to limit access to certain viewpoints or ideas.

In short, a non-neutral net would be a win for ISPs, but a loss for everyone else. Don't let this happen to the internet. It is an utterly unique technology, one that has taken our world by storm and quickly become an essential part of our lives. Just try getting a job without it. The free and open access to information the internet provides has changed our world for the better. Don't let ISPs undo that in the name of profits. Internet service providers should be regulated as common carriers, in order to ensure the future of the internet for the good of all. In this day and age, internet access is no longer a luxury but an essential part of human life, and it should be protected as such.

Making the ISP's merely lane control agents is OK provided the cable operators are not generating or managing content.

As a member of both afore mentioned groups, I have grave concerns about your latest decision to move forward with weakened language regarding Net Neutrality that opens the door for wealthy internet companies to pay for faster internet access while leaving others with slower access.

Opening up even the smallest possibility for this to happen, by not directly codifying that it cannot and must not, is a grave mistake for democracy that will negatively impact the vast majority while benefitting a very few. The benefactors of your decision will enjoy an unfair amount of control over information and business. The citizens of this country

Providing individuals, start-ups and small companies with equal access is good for business, innovation and democracy. The fact that ComCast and Time Warner Cable represent nearly 75% of internet service in the United States is troubling. Combining that monopoly with the ability to charge extra for internet speeds is just the wrong decision.

To: Chairman Wheeler and the rest of the Federal Communications Commission,

How can the US call itself a democratic society, when rather than heeding the views of it's people, it betrays their trust and opts to side with the corporate backers that line it's profits?

The lack of net neutrality means that censorship by indirect discretion becomes possible, in that ISPs are free to censor and reduce services based on their own preferences - content that may be quality and informative in origin. In a sense, a way for corporations to indirectly wage war on the people without having to get their hands dirty.

Run a peer-to-peer network? Chances are it would be throttled. Run a website with undesirable content? A quick word from one executive to another, and chances are it would be throttled (like how the US government whispered in the ears of paypal, mastercard etc to silence wikileaks).

And it affects not just the US: but the rest of the world. The world that access the US content. Is it fair to punish people of, say, Europe, because the US opts to throttle access to high-demand content, like youtube and downloadable media?

How is ignoring people democratic? How is reducing the delivery of content to one person but increasing it for another any real solution to the problem? So the internet is no longer classless and free, with all as equals: but tiers of groups, rich versus poor, fast versus slow?

For a communications network commission, it's extremely difficult for us to communicate our points across to you if you opt to always ignore them. Communication is two-way.

And sometimes... actions speak louder than words.

Force feeding people ads doesn't work and big cable wants to hold users hostage and make them pay more for "certain" content. To Chairman Tom Wheeler and the FCC Commissioners——

The modern economy would collapse without the internet and American life would be extraordinarily disrupted. It's a simple fact that the internet is a public utility, not a private service. It's time we regulated it as such.

Subject: Net Neutrality

Good afternoon,

I would like to voice my opinion on the topic of net neutrality. I believe allowing ISPs to have any say in prioritization and availability of access to websites would be disastrous.

An overwhelmingly common complaint about television access is bundling of unrelated channels. If I want to watch the Sy-Fy channel, I also have to purchase all the bundled channels I will never watch. The average consumer would rather just buy what they want. The Internet provides this, but a change to net neutrality would move closer to the television model. In essence, it would ignore the benefits to consumers to pander to ISPs attempting to extract more money from a dependent demographic.

Thank you for listening to the public response. Legislation in this country should be reviewed by the people affected, not merely by corporate lobbyists.

Cheers,
Luke

To Chairman Tom Wheeler and the FCC Commissioners——

Allowing internet service providers to create internet “fast lanes” and “slow lanes” would do nothing more than allow them to extort payments from companies like Netflix. It’s time to admit that the internet is a public utility, not a private “service.”

To Chairman Tom Wheeler and the FCC Commissioners——

FCC——

The 21st century internet is an integral part of our economy, democracy, and communication systems. America is absolutely dependent on an open internet operating on net neutrality principles.

As such, you have an obligation to regulate it as a utility. Please assert your Title II authority, and stop trying to appease the telecom giants at the expense of everyone else.

Thank you,

The internet is central to American life and the modern economy. It makes no sense to regulate it as a private “service.” It is a public utility and should be treated as such.

Please declare the internet to be a public utility. I understand other countries have moved ahead of the USA in internet services. Is that because of private companies getting special treatment? If not, please stop even considering this idea. Thank you.

Greetings:

I wish to convey my wish that the pay-to-play system on the internet is scrapped in favor of net neutrality; with all data treated the same.

The pay-to-play system will only reward those with "deep pockets" and marginalize the not so well off.

Too many aspects of American life have devolved into a "haves and have-nots". Do not continue on this course. The country will be all the worse.

Thanks for your time.

To the FCC——

Please build any net neutrality argument upon solid legal standing. Specifically, this means reclassifying broadband under Title II of the Telecommunications Act of 1934.

706 authority from the Telecommunications Act has been repeatedly struck down in court after legal challenges by telecom companies. Take the appropriate steps to prevent this from happening again.

To whom it may concern,

I believe that the proposal in question, which you have the power to decide the fate on, would be a detrimental step in the wrong direction. It will undoubtedly open a Pandora's box to limiting the free speech of individuals through the vested interests of corporate profiteering. There is no need for this as these companies already net billions of dollars. There needs to be regulations on what they are entitled to do, and a free internet that allows individuals the venue to communicate and keep them in check.

Net neutrality must remain open and not based on who has more money for faster and better sites. This limits the world access to the internet of global information. In this new age of information it is now a right of every person on earth to communicate freely. We are not charged to speak, therefore we shouldn't have to be charged to communicate. If we wish to advance into the future as a species we must not put holds and stipulations on progress and the flow of ideas and information. If the telegraph was facing such obstructing rules as the internet is now then Lincoln could not have coordinated as effectively to win the civil war. If the first telephone and radio networks faced these problems the second world war may have concluded much differently. If big corporations are allowed to take hold of the biggest free flow of information and ideas the very future of humanities progress will be greatly impeded and impaired. In order for unity, fairness and progress the one free place for ideas and information must remain free and open for all to access on a fair basis. The internet is the collected conscious awareness of the world and you cannot tell people how, when and what to think and say. History has shown repeatedly that communication is the connection between worlds, you cannot and will not impede the human right to, basically, speak.

I am appalled that the FCC would even consider that big telecom companies can dictate who can have access to the internet and who cannot. This is the United States, not North Korea or another oppressed nation.

In a nation where we are supposed to be free and democratic we should also have the simple right to have non controlled access to the internet.

Please vote against this reprehensible proposal that only financially benefits telecom companies and in no way benefits the American people.

Dear Sirs,

I am very concerned about the threat to net neutrality posed by the cable companies in the US.

Given that swathes of the US and indeed cities are beholden often to only one carrier, be it Charter, AT&T, Comcast, Verizon or Time Warner Cable and that we already have one of the most expensive cable services of anywhere in the world, allowing them to dictate net availability and speeds will further dent the lack of transparent competition. It will also have the effect of stunting the development and growth of new enterprises, stunting employment growth, whilst merely filling the coffers of these companies and their shareholders.

Please take into careful consideration the long term implications of granting control of the internet to large corporates of this world at the expense of innovation and free enterprise of talented and aspiring individuals and groups. Potentially, those who may find their voices blocked could be those who campaign for the values on which the free democratic world is based with human rights and freedom of speech curtailed or even blocked.

Yours faithfully,

Stopping major rich companies from getting involved in the control of Internet speed is key to ensuring that equality is even possible in the US. Imagine yourself unable to access your email for even one day-disastrous, right? How dare you say that it is OK for others to go without the same service simply because they are poor?

To Chairman Tom Wheeler and the FCC Commissioners——

Allowing internet service providers to create internet “fast lanes” and “slow lanes” would do nothing more than allow them to extort payments from companies like Netflix. It’s time to admit that the internet is a public utility, not a private “service.”

Anyone aware of this issue would be appalled that focus is being placed on internet micromanagement instead of the actual world we live in. This is a waste of everyone's time including the FCC, which says a lot looking at their history (and general effectiveness)

This is an outrage! Obama promised net neutrality. What is his (or any other political promise) worth?

Zip. I reckon 90% of people in office are guilty of bait and switch...this is another classic.

The corporate "fix" is in, again.

And with the Courts (stacked with pro-corporate appeasers and fund-raisers) we've just about put "America on eBay" – available for the taking by the highest bidder.

--This is an outrage! Obama promised net neutrality. What is his (or any other political promise) worth?

Zip. I reckon 90% of people in office are guilty of bait and switch...this is another classic.

The corporate "fix" is in, again.

And with the Courts (stacked with pro-corporate appeasers and fund-raisers) we've just about put "America on eBay" – available for the taking by the shock troops of K-street.

Government has become a big pop machine: Put money in, and out pops corporate policy.

Is that what the Founders envisioned? Is that what our Service members fought and died for?

Or are ya'll getting a few sips of the pop?

The internet is a free place for everyone, no one has the right to take away any form of freedom. I need the internet a lot of the time to obtain valuable information. companies shouldn't be able to block or slow down any body's internet connectivity. Sure they can provide a faster server but they cannot be allowed to limit others.

These new rules put forth of the FCC would destroy the free and open Internet as we know it. They create an Internet that favors the richest one percent--- namely, the Internet service providers--- allowing them full control over the content that can be viewed on the Internet.

The Internet is an important tool for education, medical advancement, technological development, and entertainment, among other things. The new rules proposed would create a two-tiered Internet where major corporations would benefit from high speed, whereas the average American would find their Internet service drastically slowed down and some websites even blocked, eliminating the free and open Internet that we as Americans rely on dearly.

We as Americans hope that the FCC will stand with us to support and maintain net neutrality.

Hello,

I am a computer science professor and Net Neutrality is something that the internet and our country desperately needs enshrined in policy.

The anti-competitive advantages of incumbent corporations will work to limit innovation and growth in the technology sector - effectively locking in our current companies and hindering new ones from emerging.

We need equal bandwidth for all websites, regardless of their ability to pay for access to consumers.

We also need higher internet speeds and we must end the duopoly in this country and embrace competition like Google fiber in order to bring our internet speeds up to international standards. There is no reason not to do this.

Let's get it done!

The internet needs to be a level playing field for anyone to put out content and information. Every citizen should have equal access. The FCC's proposal would kill equal access and internet "democracy". Rather than cave in to industry pressure, the FCC should listen to the citizens and preserve net neutrality.

Moving forward with this proposal will destroy what has made the internet the most dynamic method of communication and decision-making tool that has ever existed.

You cannot cater to the the large telecom companies and give them the authority and the power to decide who gets more velocity and bandwidth. They will simply serve the 1% -5% of the world that can afford their prices. You are creating an oligopoly of where the few dictate to the many.

Equal access to the internet is in many ways comparable to freedom of speech. Allowing companies to decide based on money who gets to speak on the internet by controlling access to sites is undemocratic and anti-American. It would be a form of legalized censorship, which is unacceptable.

I support Net Neutrality and urge the FCC to take a stand protecting communication in America by supporting net neutrality over corporate interests.

Dear FCC,

Just once, ONCE in your annoying, pathetic, meaningless existence; DO SOMETHING RIGHT FOR A CHANGE! Keep the internet like it is. Why is our nation even having this conversation? If you people have even a shred of decency; if you have even the tiniest drop of respect for the people you "serve," then tell Corporate America and their army of lawyers to go stick it!

But you probably won't. You've probably already made up your minds, having been bought and sold long ago. Everybody else has their fingers crossed, hoping you'll do the right thing. I know better. I harbor no such false hope. I know the only reason for your existence is to eventually wipe out the last remnants of free speech. I know you will perform as expected by your corporate masters.

I also know that my friends think I'm bonkers when I say things like that. So go ahead FCC. Prove me wrong. Dare ya.

I urge each and every one of you who uses the Internet to take a stand against the major companies who are a threat to cyber-space. Together, we can truly make a difference in the world.

To Chairman Tom Wheeler and the FCC Commissioners—

To the FCC—

Please build any net neutrality argument upon solid legal standing. Specifically, this means reclassifying broadband under Title II of the Telecommunications Act of 1934.

706 authority from the Telecommunications Act has been repeatedly struck down in court after legal challenges by telecom companies. Take the appropriate steps to prevent this from happening again.

The internet is a place of equal access and opportunity and is a place of democracy as much as the rest of our country should be. Allowing people to pay to have faster access to some websites while hindering access to others is opening the doors to an online oligarchy. This is not okay and I and the rest of the public of the United States demand that this does not happen.

The internet was designed as a mode of open communication and networking, and we will not have the control of what should be public domains be placed under the control of private parties.

Let us instead keep it a free and open place which reflects the democratic values our country was founded upon.

Furthermore, what's the deal with all of this necessity of control? Capitalism isn't that great to being with, and the passing of this law is another checkpoint to the falling of the US into an oligarchy. This needs to stop. We cannot let money speak for us or rule our land. The people are in charge, not the money or corporations. Please do not pass this proposal.

A neutral net represents the future of both modern capitalism and modern democracy. Neither can flourish without a national commitment to net neutrality. Innovation seldom springs from monopolistic enterprises, but rather from small groups and individuals who see and meet a need in the market. I strongly urge you to keep the Internet equal and neutral for all. Let the monopolies buy out the websites and applications the entrepreneurs develop on a neutral net, much as the Huffington Post developed, but give them no advantage in the competition to start.

Up until now, all traffic on the Internet has been treated equally. Allowing ISPs to charge more for preferential treatment will, by necessity, relegate any traffic from those unwilling or unable to pay the higher prices to a more unreliable channel. The potential for abuse by the ISPs is far too great to allow. ISPs that sell VoIP phone service could throttle the VoIP traffic of competing providers. ISPs that sell cable TV could throttle the traffic of Netflix and Hulu. ISPs that support a particular candidate in an election could throttle the traffic of the websites of the opposing parties' candidates. Allowing ISPs to charge more for preferential treatment of Internet traffic is antithetical to democracy and to fair competition in the marketplace. Broadband Internet service providers need to be reclassified as common carriers to ensure net neutrality for the benefit of all Americans and not just a few wealthy corporations.

Don't let the corporate elite and their political puppets take control of the Internet, which was meant to further free communication by the people of the world. Whether the elite call themselves right wing or left wing, their actual goal is to secure control of the people through fear and surveillance - all for their own financial gain.

If we let this happen, we're lost.

As a frequent internet user I urge you to keep the internet open and neutral. The changes which are currently being proposed would squelch creativity and new business start-ups. This would also be a big step backward for democracy. Don't do it!

Access to information is a human right, and providers should have no say in what we can or cannot access. A closed Internet is a first step toward a state in which knowledge is available only to those who can afford it. Please support net neutrality.

Why is there any need to do this? It's a terrible idea and this would be the only country in the world to do something like this. It's selfish, it limits so many things and stifles so many people. Why should big businesses get more? Why should they continue to be spoon fed? Please, stop this asinine attempt to do nothing other than garner more money. Instead of trying to solve other issues that are plaguing our country, you want to ruin something that has the potential to become even greater? We are in serious debt, mental illness is thrown away at the wayside with little done to help those with it or prevent problems because of it, gun laws need to be more strict or more innocent people like children in school will die from them. Homelessness, unemployment, there are so many other things that need focus right now. Stop this foolishness, stop trying to destroy the internet.

The internet belongs to everyone. As someone who works in IT, a failure of the creation of Net Neutrality could threaten the existence of my job. I also know that it costs money to maintain the infrastructure of the internet, and that the more heavy users should have to pay more for usage. That is fair and I support that. But the power to shut down large portions of the internet should never be concentrated into the hands of a small number of people. I think we can come together and find a way to fairly administer the Internet for the betterment of all.

It makes sense that if we are to succeed as a nation, each person must have easy/affordable access to the highest-speed internet possible in order to obtain and deliver information.

You guys want to rule the hole world!! More and more money to pad your pockets!! Now you want to take over the internet also!! This is ludicrous!!! You want telecom companies (who are in your pocket) to decide who gets internet, who gets slow internet, who is blocked! When will this insanity end with you? When is enough, enough, for you, despicable money grubbers? I do hope the American people (the ones without money) dropkick your proposal to hell!! Back to witch it you spawned. In other words GO TO HELL!!! We are mad as hell and we are not going to take it anymore. Put that in your pocket!! You may have the money, we have the masses!!

FCC, do you realize that enacting this proposal will adversely impact your and our children? Students will be crippled in their research for their education as many and even the best schools online data will either not be accessible because of the cost to get good download and data access speeds is not affordable, or they will take the money from their budgets for class instruction or student safety.

In this age where most post high school education depends heavily on doing almost everything but person to person instruction online, this proposal would put education in the garbage.

The community college where I am employed will find it next to impossible to register students if this is enacted. We're just one of thousands who would find themselves in the same situation. Please, vote this down.

The proposal in front of the FCC would allow Comcast, AT&T and other big telecom companies to decide who can benefit from fast Internet speed -- while slowing down, or even blocking, everyone else -- and making millions in profit from it!

The principle of open access to the internet must be preserved. Paying for preferential/faster access is unfair and discriminates against small businesses and anyone who cannot afford the higher rates. We the people are citizens, not merely consumers. The FCC's charter and mission may have been rewritten by fools to be all about business but it was created to preserve a multiplicity of voices in public discourse, recognizing that the air in which radio and TV waves travel is public space. THE INTERNET IS NO DIFFERENT. The health and unity of the country is supported by the openness of this public space and the discourse that is allowed to take place there. THE JOB OF THE FCC COMMISSIONERS IS TO DO WHAT IS BEST FOR THE AMERICAN PEOPLE AND PUBLIC, NOT INDIVIDUAL CORPORATE INTERESTS.

Reclassify the Internet as a telecommunications service and stop this reckless drive to enshrine corporate interests over democratic principles.

Hello,

My name is Kaly and I am a 23-year-old law student. I have used the internet my entire life, and feel blessed to have been born in a time after its invention. This commission is on the cusp of making history, and it is up to you how you would like to be remembered. You can cave to corporate pressure, further proving to the American people that it is businesses, not us, who have power in government. Or you can represent our interests, which is what we elected you to do.

Perhaps I am idealistic, but I believe in the American way. That America has a government for the people, by the people. Make no mistake that creating fast and slow lanes is not for the good of American citizens.

My generation is coming into power, and we will not tolerate the internet being radically altered for the sake of profit.

Without an issue to unite us we may appear to have little clout, but rest assured this has the potential to bring us together. Please be on the right side of history.

Thank you,

Kaly Rule

I don't agree that big companies should get preferential treatment when it comes to internet speed. We are all entitled to information access via the internet equally. Allowing corporations to pay for and receive preferential treatment by internet providers is not fair to the rest of us, the public of the USA. We are all created equal. Please remember the Declaration of Independence of this country and honor our founders by standing up against this proposal. It is preferential treatment by means of big money and power. It is not equality.

Hi,

The Internet is a great means of people to express how they feel and what they decide to see. Also a great way for independant workers to start up their businesses, etc. Major companies shouldn't be allowed to manipulate who gets faster Internet speeds. It will ruin the way we use the Internet as we know it - I truly can't think of anything worse and think it would be a huge mistake!

The huge monopoly companies in the U.S. already have the advantage of power over smaller companies. But until now, their size has been mitigated by the structure of the Internet, where even the little guy has a shot. Now, incredibly, the FCC wants to take even this bread crumb away and once again the "fat cats" win.
In an era where monopoly media rules, with the FCC's blessing, this proposal makes me believe we need to completely re-structure the FCC and replace it instead with a citizen's panel. This proposal will drastically change the Internet and kill its entrepreneurial spirit.

The internet has in my lifetime fundamentally changed what it is like to live in an industrial society (it does not suck so bad anymore). The ISP's are simply exhibiting rent-seeking behavior as we would expect oligopolists to do. There is no reason that the ISP's should be able to determine which sites are the fastest and easiest to access and then profit off of it. Since there is not a substantial level of competition amongst ISPs, it is of paramount importance that the government restrain their attempts to flex their market power at the expense of the American People. We certainly should not repeat the mistakes that we did when the railroads were being built in this country. We need to restrain monopolies and oligopolies, not encourage their growth. If those imperfectly competitive markets are naturally so, then it may be appropriate to subsidize the ISPs in exchange for controlling much of their functioning through democratic institutions. Without a free and open internet, all we will have is a nation ruled by corporate influence, with an all-but-silent populace.

THE INTERNET WILL PRODUCE MORE VALUE IF KEPT FREE AND OPEN. THE PROPOSAL AMOUNTS TO LITTLE MORE THAN A TRANSFER OF WEALTH (with deadweight loss) FROM THE PEOPLE AT LARGE TO THESE FEW CORPORATIONS AND THE PEOPLE WHO DISPROPORTIONATELY BENEFIT FROM THOSE CORPORATE PROFITS.

The modern economy would collapse without the internet and American life would be extraordinarily disrupted. It's a simple fact that the internet is a public utility, not a private service. It's time we regulated it as such.

People talk about how great this country is. A land of opportunity. Land of the free. Where if you work hard, you can do anything. Where you are free to express yourself, to practice your own religion, to basically THINK for yourself.

So why would you support something that would counteract these very values? Do not allow companies to use their already strong foothold to prevent anyone else from even attempting to better their lives. Don't allow them to hold ideas at ransom by preventing people from spreading their message.

The internet is a wonderful thing. It can be used to change the world in amazing ways. It is a means for those who are otherwise oppressed to have their own voice.

Please do not contribute to destroying what has become a life net for so many people.

The internet is central to American life and the modern economy. It makes no sense to regulate it as a private “service.” It is a public utility and should be treated as such.

Please declare the internet to be a public utility

Subject: Do Not End Net Neutrality

To: Chairman Wheeler and the rest of the Federal Communications Commission,

Net neutrality is an important issue today. It has implications for poor people who will not be able to afford the increases in cost.

It also has implications for schools and students across the country. Schools may not have access to those faster speeds, and that will negatively impact learning. In addition, those same poor who cannot afford the fast speeds at home may have issues completing assignments outside of school, and that will impact their progress in school as well.

In addition, it is unfair to businesses, large and small. The increase in cost will hurt those businesses, and they will be likely to pass it on to the consumers. With an already weak economy, this is a bad policy that could make things even worse for the economy.

Please support net neutrality now.

This is another attempt to give corporations more power over the people. President Obama will be remembered as the man who sold out America to the corporations. The people oppose these actions and the results of the government ignoring the wishes of the people will be disastrous in the end.

The internet should be almost free or almost free everywhere in the world to provide the emerging world community a means to strengthen it bonds & ability to act for global justice & social accountability while remaining a crucial life line for so many families & communities spread around the world.

Please, I beg you, don't give into the big cable companies. We need the internet to run at the same speed for everyone. In fact, internet services should be regulated like a utility - which is what they are.

Thank you

To Chairman Tom Wheeler and the FCC Commissioners—

FCC—
The 21st century internet is an integral part of our economy, democracy, and communication systems. America is absolutely dependent on an open internet operating on net neutrality principles.

As such, you have an obligation to regulate it as a utility. Please assert your Title II authority, and stop trying to appease the telecom giants at the expense of everyone else.

Thank you,

The Internet has always been a level playing field for anyone to put out content, creativity, innovation and information. It's what's made independent media outlets like Democracy Now! reach a massive audience that would otherwise be relegated to choosing from corporate media channels like Fox News. It's the lifeline that allows small innovators to create a service that reaches almost everyone on the globe. But the FCC's proposal could kill this Internet democracy.

If the FCC passes these rules, huge companies could pay to make their websites faster and easier to use than all of their smaller competitors. The largest and richest broadband providers like Comcast and Verizon argue that they need more money to invest in new networks. But in reality, they are simply increasing profits by building up monopolies that just benefit their shareholders.

It is your responsibility to prevent this. The world is watching.

I demand that Congress protect freedom and openness on the Internet by passing legislation to protect network neutrality.

The Internet is our most democratic medium. It has grown exponentially, fueled innovation and altered how we communicate. Network neutrality is the guiding principle that has allowed for these advancements.

Now, for-profit interests want to violate the principle of network neutrality in order to increase their own profit margins. They must not be allowed to destroy the free and open culture of the web.

I strongly urge you and your colleagues in Congress to support robust net neutrality legislation that prohibits network operators from blocking, impeding or interfering with any lawful Internet traffic or prioritizing any content or services.

The FCC, along with all other branches/divisions/commissions in our great society, was created to protect our people from harm, of all types it sees fit, through the ever expanding communications network of modern times. It is simply a commission designed to further our democracy amongst our people, preserving and maintaining our roots as a free nation, in which all men are created equal. Please honor this original intention and the resist the easy choice of caving to the corporate pressure/money. Please keep our internet, perhaps the most important bastion of free communication our society has ever known, open. Thank you.

If there were no neutrality in the days of the first telephones, competition and political speech (in the form of campaign fundraising calls) would have been stifled.

The same holds equally true for the internet.

Yesterdays start-ups are today's internet oligarchs. Tomorrow's internet giants deserve their chance to compete and innovate.

Popular political movements (like the Arab Spring) could not have happened if their connection speeds were throttled.

Please do not strangle what makes the internet great.

It would be unamerican.

Regulate the internet like the public utility it is.

Thank You!

Subject: Please Do Not End Net Neutrality

To: Chairman Wheeler and the rest of the Federal Communications Commission,

Last week, your department sent me a form email with a few platitudes. We need action, not empty promises, which can be broken at any time.

Companies like Verizon are already making huge profits. They do not need more. The common good must come first over corporations' excess profit.

The Internet is now a necessity for all of us, particularly people who are low income, or who otherwise have no voice. It is vital for keeping in touch with far-flung friends and family. Small organizations and businesses depend on it. We need it to research hard-to-find primary sources that cannot easily be found in libraries. Sites like <http://www2.gwu.edu/~nsarchiv/> would be slowed to the point of being unusable, or blocked completely.

Many people are barely getting by. A two-tiered Internet would deprive them of needed information.

Blocking or slowing sites so that they are unusable would hamper innovation, which would hurt the economy.

It would also endanger people in countries where human rights are violated because they would not be able to communicate easily the rest of the world.

Corporate censorship is unacceptable, and should not be tolerated under any circumstances.

Please rule that broadband be a utility.

Thank you for listening.

Dear FCC,

I do not know all of the politics involved or the minute details of your proposal. What I do know is that as part of the working class, working with a constantly changing technology and being a student of the information field, the need to correctly address the conductivity of the internet in a fashion in which the consumers receive the most benefit, is at the utmost sensitivity. A much more detailed outline of the internet and it's usage must be establish for future infrastructure, security, and progression of our nations technology over the rest of the world. Not to draw a direct comparison, but the throttling of data services over cellular phones, is a much similar situation to the one you are addressing. A consumer paying the advertised price for a product that gives them the freedom to develop (in many more ways than one), deserves the ability to access services that the rest of the world receives in a stable fashion. Providing companies, ISP's, and networks the ability to limit or exceed the available resources based on the dollar amount set, is not the appropriate way to address the issue at hand. Please consider a solution that makes it worth while for a student or entrepreneur the ability to create a revolutionary technology that furthers the advancement of information technology. Please make the appropriate amendments to current policies to more generalize the standard definition of the open internet and protect, probably the most valuable resource available this day and age.

Thanks for listening,

Bobby Clapp

Please build any net neutrality argument upon solid legal standing. Specifically, this means reclassifying broadband under Title II of the Telecommunications Act of 1934.

706 authority from the Telecommunications Act has been repeatedly struck down in court after legal challenges by telecom companies. Take the appropriate steps to prevent this from happening again.

The internet was created with American tax payer money...

The internet began as a public asset. Today it has become a global asset, with billions of people relying on it for prosperity and information.

Your administration is inciting a global cyber war between companies and against ordinary citizens, by your decision not to specifically prohibit bandwidth throttling on the public internet.

Other than being a consumer issue, you are also legalizing violations of free speech, and rights of equal protection under the law for all Americans.

Subject: Response to the FCC request for comment regarding the Open Internet initiative
Dear Chairman,

I perceive that the FCC is in the same position as King Solomon once was, and must judge which mother the baby belongs to. It must be a difficult responsibility to undertake, and I do not envy the concessions you must have to make to bring about order in this time of uncertainty.

That being said, this federal mandate cannot currently protect all companies from economic sabotage by considerable monopolies. Monopolies which also compete directly in the same entertainment medium.

If anything, a decision should be rendered that precludes the ability of those who control the means of transmitting data from committing infanticide against any business regardless of scope, size or purpose from attempting to conduct business over these digital lanes of traffic. The success of the Internet as we know it has been largely attributed to a freedom to conduct business openly over these lines of communication, on equal grounds as anyone else may be.

There are certain corporations with a direct interest in preventing other legitimate entertainment distributors from competing without hindrance in the same market which they themselves have a monopoly. A monopoly that is yet again expanding even further, making this an important moment in U.S. history. The FCC in this case has explicitly excluded the smaller business owners in one hand from the same protections provided to others in the other. It is a hypocrisy that cannot withstand scrutiny by any bounds of the imagination.

I hope you make the right choice, because it affects the freedom of small businesses to innovate for centuries to come. Simply put. If it is wrong for some, then it is wrong for all.

Thank you for giving my thoughts consideration. And, thank you for offering this public commentary.

Sincerely,

Nelson Rush

The internet should remain neutral and without influence from huge telecom companies. It is worldwide and offers an open forum for communication. Please do not change its present structure. Do the right thing. Be fair to everyone.

Subject: Comment

Chairman Wheeler,

Internet openness is best enhanced by the least amount of regulation. Having the freedom to chose is key among the facets of freedom required for the internet to continue to be successful.

I question allowing Comcast to achieve near monopolist position in this arena. Such a move is a large failure especially given the history of Comcast's disregard for its customer base. Pricing for efficiency of product is also a very poorly conceived concept, except for the entity handed the ability to establish the price.

Prior to acceptance of any new regulation whatsoever the companies involved should be required to demonstrate their competence at providing services that are actually of value. AT&T has a billing program which many people are not able to understand. This has happened with impunity. Time Warner displays indifference to their customer base.

My comments are based on first hand experience in the first two cases and comments of a friend to me regarding his service in the latter.

Please note that whatever becomes regulated deteriorates because those involved feel it necessary to establish empires within the structure to attempt to gain added perceived power.

Any further regulation is against my wishes as a citizen of the United States.

Understand that if the internet begins to turn into a morass I will discontinue it's use and go solely to phone. In my opinion that is the lesser of the evil monopolies.

Please, keep it open - if you want to stimulate the economy (rather than the pockets of a few - no doubt with 'offshore accounts' save our Open Internet.

Internet providers have used the protections of Common Carriers when it was to their interest to use them. Internet providers should be officially classified as Common Carriers, and not allowed to speed up or slow down service to preferred content providers.

Additionally, monopolization of the ISP marketplace must be stopped, so that ISPs no longer have the stranglehold on content providers that allows them to coerce these deals. It is blatantly against the spirit of capitalism to create a market where businesses are no longer accountable to their customers, and can refuse to update their services to the levels that are present in third world countries (and yes, internet access in the US is worse than many third world countries in SE Asia). This is exactly the place where government regulations must come in to end the rise of coercive monopolistic market manipulations, where customers have no options available that meet their needs, and where new companies are met with unsurmountable barriers to provide those services to the customers who want to pay for fast, reliable reception of packages regardless of their sender.

Net neutrality is as essential as public roads and free speech. To allow companies to restrict internet traffic for their own benefit would be like allowing utility companies to charge more for cleaner water. It is absurd enough as it is that they're charging more for higher speeds, where they're available, when it requires no more effort on their part than lower speeds.

They're like racketeers demanding that we all pay up or else.

Net neutrality is immensely important since I'm on a fixed income and because of that, the Internet is my window to the world. I pay a high price for high-speed Internet access and shouldn't have to pay even more for internet content. This proposed price gouging is unconscionable.

Dear FTC,

I want to urge you to maintain Net Neutrality and not create an unequal playing field in at least one aspect of modern life.

With now 10% of Americans with 90% of concentrated wealth in the US; everyday folks, that is, 90% of us need some place left to have the freedom to express ourselves freely and without a caste system such as we have now in politics in our nation due to corporate takeover of campaign contributions.

The Internet is not to be owned by AT&T or any private company, but by the people, for the people.

Thank you for taking the courage to stop the corporate efforts to control the flow of access and information on the Internet.

Members of FCC,

I support Net Neutrality. To deviate from that is to insert a "skimming" operation in the system, sanctioned by the Government. I thought the Middle Ages were finished.

Keep inserting these taxes everywhere and pretty soon this will turn into a catastrophe.

I don't know at this point who the Government works for - the people or the multinational corporations.

It is just sad to watch - those who cannot create destroy those who can and do. And yes, I'm referring to the members of the FCC.

To whom it may concern:

I am writing this email to ask that collectively, you who pull the strings at the FCC please maintain internet neutrality. I am unable to see any up side to removing restrictions and allowing what are already monopolistic companies with poor track records with customers to extort further profits based on their being strategically placed at the spigot of information dissemination. This country is being hurt enough as it is by big business, dishonest politics and special interests.

I have little hope this will even reach any of you, but I had to try. Please don't add to the problem.

Samer

Subject: Save Net Neutrality!

The internet has become integrated into the standard way of life in America. It has become a requirement for school, for many places of work, and even for the basics of finding a job as a lot of companies only receive their applications through the internet.

To make any restrictions on Net Neutrality will be highly detrimental to the people. Allowing companies to partner with services and companies will inevitably make internet access a privilege intended for the wealthy. The internet as it stands is already a privilege that one must pay for, but it simultaneously is very difficult to live without. Allowing companies to control flow of the internet to the highest bidder will create further complication for those who are barely able to pay for the services they currently have.

Furthermore, allowing companies to sell their streams to the highest bidder also creates a case for internet censorship. When the dollar is used to dictate internet priorities, so many independent workers and journalists will find themselves snuffed out of the process all together. This is detrimental to those who have started or plan to start an online business, for they will not be able to compete with major corporations. This sort of restriction to the entrepreneur is detrimental to what is believed to be the American Dream.

In regards to journalists, this presents a threat to freedom of speech. In a world of paid advertising, it is a full time task for independent media to reach the average person. They rely on word of mouth, and of the support of their readers and followers. To limit data-flow from such sites will serve to prevent them from reaching the populations they are currently reaching today.

The internet is a service that the people who use it pay for. To further restrict the access they achieve based on the dollar amount allotted is morally unacceptable, and should be viewed as discrimination of class.

The internet must always remain an open source where we as people may network, educate ourselves and share information, find business opportunities, and do so without the fear of censorship or content and traffic regulation.

Thank you

The internet should remain free and unrestricted. Data transferred should not be influenced by where it is from, and where it is going.

Netflix shouldn't be treated any differently than Emails. Companies and ISPs should not have a say in how their data is treated beyond their business. This is our access to information. This is our information "highway" and I don't want these companies deciding where I can or can't go... or at what speeds.

This is the people's decision to make... not a company's.

Your proposed path would open the door to widespread discrimination online. It would give Internet service providers the green light to implement pay-for-priority schemes that would be a disaster for startups, nonprofits and everyday Internet users who cannot afford these unnecessary tolls.

I urge you to scrap these proposed rules and instead restore the principle of online nondiscrimination by reclassifying broadband as a telecommunications service.

Please do not let companies decide what should be seen or used and what should not. Otherwise, what makes our internet better than China's regulated internet?

Subject: Internet Neutrality
To whom it may concern,

Internet traffic, both at the last mile and while travelling through core infrastructure must be treated equally. Regional monopolies already extract rents, have little incentive to improve service and provide an inferior product to that available to the majority of the developed world. Providing privileged access to companies that pay for such access will further harm the consumer. There is currently very limited competition between service providers and very few options for consumers. Allowing an internet fast lane will only exacerbate this situation. The only clear option is to classify internet access as a utility and regulate it as such. Any other course of action will further harm the American consumer and prove that the FCC is an ineffective regulatory body primarily concerned with supporting the agenda of moneyed interests.

In my view, you are the perfect embodiment of what Upton Sinclair meant when he wrote: 'It is difficult to get a man to understand something, when his salary depends on his not understanding it.' It is clear that given your history as a promoter of the interests of the telecommunications industry, that you are intent on establishing “regulations” that conform to the wishes of the telecommunications industry and not those of the citizens that depend on internet content remaining truly neutral.

Dear FCC,

I am writing to oppose rules that will allow for discrimination on the Internet - where the wealthy can purchase faster Internet service and everyone else continues to have slower service.

I do not want telecom giants and wealthy Internet companies to determine the future of the Internet. I want new ideas to flourish on the Internet and not be blocked because they do not have sufficient funds to purchase fast service and compete.

I do not want the Internet to be turned into another vehicle that allows money to flow from working Americans to the wealthiest -- where web-based services like Netflix purchase faster service and pass the costs on to consumers.

The proposal being considered would kill rather than protect Net Neutrality and allow rampant discrimination online. The Internet should be viewed as a public good and should be operated consistent with our rights to Freedom of Speech and Freedom of the Press. Turning the Internet into a pay to play scheme is unacceptable.

The 21st century internet is an integral part of our economy, democracy, and communication systems. America is absolutely dependent on an open internet operating on net neutrality principles.

As such, you have an obligation to regulate it as a utility. Please assert your Title II authority, and stop trying to appease the telecom giants at the expense of everyone else.

Federal Communications Commission

Dear Sirs,

Please accept my personal comments regarding Net Neutrality. The FCC needs to put more time, thought, and intention into the design of a solution for this very complex problem. Take more time to design a solution that will not kill future possibilities by putting more power into the hands of powerful regulators or powerful companies like Google and Comcast.

I currently publish a few small web sites and services. I pay to my hosting provider to have access to their machines and Internet pipe.

Your proposed new rules gives me great concern because they take away my ability to continue publishing without having to pay a gate keeper someday. They may not today, but they start a trend toward the time when I will have to pay the FCC, Google, or someone to publish my little websites. Even worse, someone might say that I don't qualify or I'm not a real service. I want to keep the Internet as free as possible for people to express their ideas and thoughts and services. Keep the regulators out.

It will take purposeful, thoughtful problem solving to design a solution that can recognize the costs that ISP's have to expend to handle the immense network traffic that Netflix creates. Interconnection between networks costs money.

However, as someone else said better that I "There is one Internet. It must be fast, it must be robust, and it must be open. The prospect of a gatekeeper choosing winners and losers on the Internet is unacceptable."

Kind Regards,

Dana Martens

Subject: Net Neutrality

I write to you now from a Comcast internet connection that is far too expensive, unreasonably slow, and surprisingly unreliable. Sadly, even in a top 15 media market, this is the best internet connection available to me. You see, Comcast has a local monopoly on the coaxial cable which runs on our otherwise publicly owned and regulated utility poles. This is just one of many monopolies that Comcast enjoys.

As the country transitions from traditional media to an age of open information on the internet, it is important that we keep access to that information free from the restrictions that a for-profit corporation will certainly introduce. As Chairman Wheeler is a former cable lobbyist I'm sure he has no interest in restricting the profitability that cable companies would enjoy from a tiered internet, but I would hope that he is also a human citizen of this country and a reasonable person. We're eagerly watching to see which hat he wears when the time comes.

Cable companies, like other corporations, are not our masters. They are in direct opposition to the capitalist ideals that form our national identity. Corporations seek to eliminate all competition in the interest of maximum profit. Competition is the very thing that makes capitalism great. Take it away and we become, in effect, a corporate oligarchy. We already allow companies like Comcast to hold local monopolies on what should be a public utility. Allowing them to choose what information we consumers are allowed to view on their version of the internet (it will almost certainly be content created by them) is akin to allowing 2-3 conglomerates to control all traditional news outlets (which you're already doing). The only thing that keeps us a semi-informed electorate at this point is the internet. Let corporations turn the internet into cable TV and you stack the final brick in the wall.

Sorry this got long winded. In short, the internet can be one of two things. Either it's the great equalizer that keeps the masses informed, or it's just another corporately curated way to fleece the masses and keep them in the dark (like cable tv). Please take care when deciding which you support.

Thanks

I am firmly opposed to the proposed rules regarding paid prioritization of internet services.

The internet must be equally available to everyone. Period.

The proposal would create a two-tier system where the rich and prosperous would have preferred access. Large, successful corporations would dominate the field, to the exclusion of start-ups and smaller players. This would inevitably lead to monopolistic practices (and I for one am dubious of the FCCs promise that it will take regulatory action to prevent such practices—the time to act is now, not after the worst happens).

The proposed rules are bad for the consumer, bad for the country. There will be no "open internet" if these rules pass.

Please stop.

The telephone and internet are very different but in essence they are both communications devices. We do not allow people to pay extra to ensure their phone-calls are always connected when circuits are approaching capacity. We should not allow people to pay for faster service.

Subject: Do Not Divide the Internet, Maintain True Net Neutrality
Dear FCC Commissioners,

I am writing to you, as a concerned American citizen, that the recent changes to the regulation of Internet Service Providers (ISPs) is completely antithetical to what the American people want and need the internet to be as a part of our free society.

I support making ISPs part of Title II oversight, which (in my understanding), would put the regulation of the internet by the FCC into the same class as any other common telecommunications carrier, preventing any company or group of companies from prioritizing, limiting or otherwise restricting traffic to and from consumers and businesses. This is true Internet Network Neutrality. This is what I want (and I believe many others do too)

Please consider this request and change your stances to support what I believe the American people (individuals, not corporations) want and need. There should be more honest, informative debate and the people need to chose the path here, not business interests.

My request is that the internet not in any way, shape or form have any content-prioritization or other effective control that affects the content delivered; a level playing field for all internet connected devices and people.

Thank you,

Dear Mr. Wheeler... so much disappointed in the decision of the FCC to approve "fast lanes" for the rich and super rich while we citizens have to suffer in crowded streets if not being pushed aside. For many years, we as citizens were hostage to main stream media, unable to get a letter to the editor published and then came the Internet and it equalize our chances to be heard and to speak out. Now the decision of the FCC is changing all that of that. As a columnist for Veterans Today www.veteranstoday.com I feel that all of sudden we all writers and readers became second class citizens having to wait for the bus and unable to catch and board the fast train. The Internet was the only avenue we have to express our views and now the FCC decision muzzled all that. As I see it this decision and with that of the Supreme Court ( Citizen United) we as citizens will soon see our right to vote eroded and dollars not votes will determine who will win elections and represent the people. Sad and shameful day in the history of this great country.

service should be treated equally by ALL providers and not within a certain area networks. For example. Verizon got 50$ a month from me with no change in service and in some cases less. They called it quantum. The only thing it was fast at was taking my money. I pay for 50/25. I should get 50/25 Mbps. Is turning internet into a utility the answer. I am not sure. If all traffic is treated the same shouldn't all prices be the same. So basically in a sense it is a utility. And they are all pretty close. The problem is the end product is not the same. This is due to the ability of other carriers to throttle information transfer rates.

I do not envy you job and you have a tough decision to make. But I think you have started on the correct path. You have gotten everybody's attention. That's a good thing.

Subject: FCC and internet regulation

I am writing to urge my support for Net Neutrality and the regulation of cable providers as Title II common carriers.

Specifically, I support:

- treatment of all internet traffic as equal with no designated "fast lanes" for providers with the ability to pay more. Data is data, and it should be treated equally regardless of whether the source is willing to pay more for privileged access to better distribution. Even the disingenuous term "fast lane" indicates that second class traffic would be relegated to de facto "slow lanes" based on a provider's willingness to pay for access. The fact that consumers ALREADY pay for internet access (which is increasingly threatened by ISP data caps, throttling, and censorship) means ISPs are in effect paid twice for delivering the same signals.
- reclassifying cable companies as Title II common carriers. Broadband internet access has become an indispensable utility, with no realistic alternative to local cable monopolies in providing it. They should be regulated as the telecommunications carriers they are.
- rejection of the Comcast-TimeWarner merger. Such a merger would further consolidate an industry that already faces a dearth of competition, daunting startup costs, and that enjoys local monopolies for its service.

Supporting internet neutrality and REAL competition for internet service will be an economic boon.

Thank you for listening.

Subject: Keep the Internet Open and Fair
Hello,

Thank you for inviting public comment. I think ISPs should be forced to continue treating all content on the web equally.

Forcing ISPs to treat all content equally is the correct way to ensure that all voices — the new, the established, the next, and the marginalized — have space. If YouTube had been forced to pay extra carrier fees early in its life, or Netflix for that matter, would they have become the giants they have? If we increase the marginal expense of reaching consumers in a random fashion by granting ISPs that power, we cede the advancement of technology to demonstrably conservative actors.

And there is a simple question of who decides. If ISPs can censor and slow at will, what can stop activist networks from pushing on those companies to halt what they do not approve of? If a religious group called Comcast complicit in hate speech for delivering content Internet users requested that they found blasphemous, what can Comcast do? We're removing their shield of "we deliver all to all equally," which could harm ISPs down the road.

There is already enough special interest skewing going on in the information that the American public receives. To add this deeper layer of skewing would be a disaster, removing any pretense of objectivity in anything.

Thank you for listening,

Dear FCC:

As the Cofounder of an internet startup, and a concerned citizen, I urge you to protect net neutrality. It is unfathomable to me that the interests of powerful communications monopolies, who should not only be illegal, but whose abusive business practices are already unacceptable, are nevertheless threatening the livelihoods, not to mention the freedom of expression of regular, powerless citizens like most internet users. This threatens the survival of thousands of innovative small businesses and individuals who are really at the forefront of progress and technology and who are the businesses and citizens you exist to protect.

My budding business will not be able to survive a tiered pricing system. The blatant unfairness of a slow lane goes completely against the principles of fair business, and ultimately democracy and freedom. We are tired of corporate interests paying their way to ineffectual government entities, who seem to be far more in thrall to big money than to the protection of the citizenry.

I urge you not to allow the slow lane to happen.

Dear Mr. Chairman,

After hearing about the initiatives by large internet service providers such as Verizon and Comcast, to charge a fee to websites in order to access high-speed delivery services to consumers, I was greatly concerned. I believe this is an unfair attempt to commoditize access to public domain information. I acknowledge that internet service providers do perform an important role in the communications industry, however, instituting unnecessary fees to content providers will needlessly add cost to the system. Through this policy, the ISPs are not adding any value to the current system, which might warrant remuneration, rather they are simply seeking to benefit from both content providers and consumers. Consumers already pay a premium for broader bandwidth and high-speed access to content, but this policy will prevent consumers who are already paying for this convenience from experiencing it's full benefit. This policy, if allowed, will create an internet class system, an unnecessary, unhelpful, and unjust hierarchy among websites. Please do not allow these companies to continue to "nickel-and-dime" us and limit our access to freely shared information. Thank you.

Greg Nelson, MD

Dear FCC:

Maintaining net neutrality is essential for innovation, healthy competition, and economic development.

Please reject any new rules that favor or discriminate data packets from certain parties on the internet.

It is abundantly clear that in order to protect net neutrality, ISPs must be defined as common carriers.

Changing the rules to let broadband Internet Service Providers (ISPs) demand payment from websites and app developers would eradicate Net Neutrality, not preserve it. Any time one group of packets is favored on an IP network the rest of the traffic is, by definition, discriminated against. Given the current state of congestion the ISPs have allowed to develop at their interconnections with the Internet, any discrimination results in a degradation or blocking of services to the consumer – services the consumer has paid for.

The time has come for the FCC to adopt Net Neutrality rules that provide clear, strong protections for the Open Internet and all Americans, once and for all.

Dear Chairman Wheeler,

I want to speak out strongly in favor of the concept of net neutrality and urge you and the commissioners to move beyond the present politicalization of this matter and consider what is best for all Americans and not just the loudest voices, or worse, those with the most money.

There are so many trends in our country polarizing our society between the most economically advantaged and those who are not. Rules that would permit a "fast" and "slow" internet are just one more contributor to this social divide. Such rules would insure that the internet will become controlled for the benefit of those who can afford to buy access and dictate content, and the interests of those who cannot will be pushed further to the sidelines. The wealthy controllers of the portals like Comcast and Verizon and service providers like Netflix with deep pockets, will ultimately determine not only what we have access to, but what it will cost us....and so those of us, for example, with Comcast and Netflix accounts, will in essence be paying twice for our access to those services. This does not bode well for a robust competitive environment, and it virtually eliminates competition because the cost of entry will be so high.

Having moved recently from the New York City area to a more rural part of the country, I already have a situation where there is limited incentive to improve service or broaden bandwidth. And there is no competition. I currently have access to Comcast or nothing and pay $2000 a year, the same as those in more urban environments, but without access to similar services because Comcast has no economic incentive to build those out. The proposed merger between Comcast and Time Warner will only exacerbate this matter, placing control of the internet and its preferred content in the hands of a few. The FCC can not allow this to happen, or permit its rulings to be influenced by lobbyists or the monied interests of a few.

It's pretty simple in my mind....the internet should be considered to be a common carrier, in the same way we have always treated our telephone network. To do otherwise, and if there is no regulatory assurance of net neutrality, many in this country who are already being left behind in other ways, will be left behind by increasingly limited options and increasingly expensive service.

To: Chairman Wheeler and the rest of the Federal Communications Commission,

Even something seemingly innocuous as allowing content providers to pay for preferential treatment in terms of speed is potentially disastrous as it could dramatically increase costs which would then be passed down to the consumer. In a time when we are all struggling with increased costs due to the likes of Obamacare for instance, having the price of even basic internet or content access shoot up would be the last thing we need.

Instead, ideally all broadband should be re-classified as a telecom service, especially considering how internet access is essentially required these days. It should also be free from bandwidth caps, possibly metered and paid for in a manner very similar to electricity. Failing that, the original 2010 Net Neutrality rules should be re-established with solid legal footing, so it would avoid the same fate as what befell it in January. We want action for democratic media, not platitudes as smokescreens for corporate domination of the Internet. We want net neutrality.

Your proposed path would open the door to widespread discrimination online. It would give Internet service providers the green light to implement pay-for-priority schemes that would be a disaster for startups, nonprofits and everyday Internet users who cannot afford these unnecessary tolls.

I urge you to scrap these proposed rules and instead restore the principle of online nondiscrimination by reclassifying broadband as a telecommunications service.

Subject: Net Neutrality
To whom it may concern,

I write as someone who has grown up with a free and open Internet. The quality of service I receive from my own free website hosting and the hosting that my sister pays for are already drastically different, but it is determined by the companies that provide these services themselves, not the ISPs they bargain with. That is right and fair, my sister has chosen to spend her money on a company that is able to provide her with a service, and I've chosen to spend less money and more time with a DIY approach.

To allow for a priority lane for content will do nothing more than prevent people like my sister and I from having these options. It will harm the small businessman who doesn't have the clout to bargain with Verizon and Comcast. It damages both content creators and consumers, profiting only those who are already profiting by the creation and consumption of this content. To harm one group's ability to profit at all in order to allow a second group to gain greater profits is against everything that we ought to stand for as a nation.

Please reconsider your ruling. The only people win by allowing a priority lane are the people who are already winning, and who will continue to win whether or not a priority lane exists.

Thank you,

Shame on the FCC for putting big business ahead of the citizens and consumers of this country. Are you not a part of the federal government that is supposed to be working for the people, not working for big business? How you don't classify broadband lines as a utility is beyond my comprehension. It's disgusting.

Make no mistake about it - allow Internet fast lanes and you will be killing fair competition on the Internet and creating an unfair marketplace where 3-4 companies get to control everything, as if they don't already control too much as it is.

SHAME ON YOU.

Subject: Net neutrality guidelines

Dear Mr. Wheeler:

I don't know why I'm writing you this because I feel like it's not going to do any good. However, this subject is important to me. Regarding Net neutrality guidelines I would like to express an objection to fast lane, slow lane internet. No one's content is more important than anyone else's. If we still claim to be a free society or country this is what is important. If it is decided any other way it is a perversion of the values that USA stands for.

All this would do is hurt mom and pop small business if you start a tier system on the internet in this way. If you proceed with fast and slow lanes based solely on ability to pay. It will create further stratification of the haves and have nots. This is the one thing that the internet does not need. Because right now everyone is free to express their opinions on an equal basis. If this stratification of fast or slow connection is allowed the internet will cease to provide a free and equal opportunity to everyone.

I thank you for your attention and for taking time to read this.

Respectfully,

Subject: Lip Service is NOT Enough

If you fail to protect Net Neutrality, you demonstrate quite clearly that you have abandoned the first two defining 'competencies' of the FCC, which are to promote competition and innovation.

- Promoting competition, innovation and investment in broadband services and facilities
- Supporting the nation's economy by ensuring an appropriate competitive framework for the unfolding of the communications revolution

Abandoning Net Neutrality has the exact opposite effect. It also means that you have also abandoned your third 'competency':

- Encouraging the highest and best use of spectrum domestically and internationally

How does allowing these massively powerful near-monopolies to constrict bandwidth and access fit in with that statement of purpose? It simply doesn't.

Either do the right thing and support Net Neutrality or admit that you're not interested in following the guiding principals of the organization that you chair and vacate the seat so someone who believes in the FCC's purpose statement can take over.

Chris Steinman ([REDACTED]) writes:

Dear FCC Chairman Tom Wheeler,

I'm writing you to raise awareness about a recent proposal on part of the Federal Communication Commission (FCC). The proposal is to allow internet service providers (ISP's), which are almost exclusively large corporations, the power to control the speed at which any internet content may be downloaded. Thus, ISP's would have the ability to discriminate against any web service they please, using any standard they wish. This could result in several, severely negative consequences.

Consider, for example, that ISP's would be able to directly restrict access to information about their competitor's services. In a similar way, they could favor business allies, and charge fees for internet representation that smaller companies likely couldn't afford. This is inherently not capitalistic.

Moreover, ISP's would have the power to restrict access to the largest library in the world, the internet. Most information services on the internet are not-for-profit, such as Wikipedia and TED, or already rely heavily on volunteer services in order to keep functioning, such as publishers of scientific content. Giving ISP's the power to charge a premium to information providers such as these will undeniably have a drastic effect on the quality, exchange, and expression of knowledge in the United States.

As a scientist in training, with a strong understanding of social philosophy and the dangers of restricted knowledge, this deeply disturbs me. Information freedom is critical not only to our development as a nation, to solving welfare problems and encouraging technological innovation, but to our freedom as individuals. If the U.S. is to remain a country where individuals are free, one fundamental right we must retain is the ability to freely access information. The justification for this is obvious: Any time that a national population's access to information has been restricted or biased, the result has been severe violence or human rights violations (for example, in China, Germany, Iran, and Egypt). This cannot be allowed to happen in the United States, and to permit the FCC to pass such a proposal is one step closer to this, a step in the wrong direction.

Thank you for your time.

Sincerely,

Chris Steinman

I'm commenting to urge Chairman Wheeler to scrap the FCC's plan to allow Internet service providers to charge for preferential treatment. These rules would destroy Net Neutrality. I urge the chairman to throw them out and instead reclassify broadband as a telecommunications service. This is the only way to restore real Net Neutrality.

Dear Mr. Wheeler,

If you allow the Comcast and Time Warner merger to happen, this will cause a great ripple effect in our country, remember the phone companies? Internet access at faster speeds is something with the countries infrastructure upgrades will allow us to compete with the other countries. Students being able to use it for homework, and yes for recreation. IF you would take a look at how other countries are providing services, now I am no way an expert, but if you allow this merger and speed reduction, think of all the people that cannot afford the service now. In order for this country to move forward technology will be the key, If the United States does not lead the way, we will fall further behind and become 2nd rate. Think of the internet as the interstate hi way system. If the internet is controlled by a few with all of the money what will happen to the many without. Please pray and think about what would be better for our country.

Respectfully

Dear Commissioner,

The future of the open Internet is in your hands. And yet you have proposed rules that would actually break it.

Your proposed path would open the door to widespread discrimination online. It would give Internet service providers the green light to implement pay-for-priority schemes that would be a disaster for startups, nonprofits and everyday Internet users who cannot afford these unnecessary tolls.

Remember, these are the companies and people that $200 billion of American taxpayer money went to for fiber, and we haven't seen a single thing for it.

I urge you to scrap these proposed rules and instead restore the principle of online nondiscrimination by reclassifying broadband as a title 2 telecommunications service.

Regulating access to Internet as a necessary utility like gas or water is an important step to the advancement of humankind. It is such a powerful tool for collaboration, education and technological progress that unfettered access should be a fundamental right.

Thank you,

-James

Over time, the existence of a commercial "fast lane" will cause the actual open internet to stagnate until it becomes irrelevant. The ISPs will have no reason to continue investing in something that competes with thier new cash cow.

You MUST declare ISP services as common carriers.

You cannot effectively regulate "some preferential treatment" while prohibiting other types of preferential treament. This is a regulatory nightmare you are attempting to unleash upon technology companies and citizens...

I repeat...

You MUST declare ISP services as common carriers.

Subject: The internet isn't a private service

To Chairman Tom Wheeler and the FCC Commissioners——

The modern economy would collapse without the internet and American life would be extraordinarily disrupted. It's a simple fact that the internet is a public utility, not a private service. It's time we regulated it as such.

Title II of the Communications Act of 1934 already grants you the authority to declare the internet a public utility and provide greater regulation to the telecommunications industry. It's long past time to declare the internet a utility.

To whom it may concern,

I find Mr. Wheeler's proposed attacks on net neutrality disturbing. The rules he has proposed would not benefit the public for which he now works but instead would be a gift to the companies that voted them into their "Halls of Fame" (Cable Television Hall of Fame and The Wireless Hall of Fame) The conflict of interest here is suffocating.

Protect net neutrality and reject Wheeler's proposed "fast lane" rules.

Dear Mr. Wheeler,

As an American citizen, I am deeply disappointed in the newly proposed rules allowing for a "fast lane" in Internet service. Your claims that a "fast lane" does not necessitate a "slow lane" are completely illogical. In fact, the existence of a "fast lane" is inherently discriminatory against those unable to pay for this special privilege. You are putting aside the needs of developing American businesses for the sake of corporate giants who cannot be relied upon to use their privileges for the benefit of their customers. I urge you to listen to the voices of the startup companies, the Internet entrepreneurs, the common citizens who call on you for protection against threats to the open internet. Please, do not go through with this proposed legislation.

Thank you for your time,

To Chairman Tom Wheeler and the FCC Commissioners——

To the FCC——

Please build any net neutrality argument upon solid legal standing. Specifically, this means reclassifying broadband under Title II of the Telecommunications Act of 1934.

706 authority from the Telecommunications Act has been repeatedly struck down in court after legal challenges by telecom companies. Take the appropriate steps to prevent this from happening again.

Dear Mr Wheeler, it has come to my attention that the FCC is considering reclassification of the world wide interconnected network known as the Internet.

Sir i am a graduate of the Cyber Security and Forensics programs hosted by Tulsa Technology Center, and i can without a doubt tell you that reclassification will be used by internet service providers (ISP's) to raise users pay subscriptions to unreasonable rates by allowing the ISP to charge "content" fees, while this might not be a big deal in the eyes of the Federal Communications Commission it should be stated that a change to our internet could cause backlash from other countries who rely on net-neutrality, keep the internet free, please do not reclassify the internet

Allowing internet service providers to create internet “fast lanes” and “slow lanes” would do nothing more than allow them to extort payments from companies like Netflix. Also, it would relegate private, "base line" individuals to second tier (or lower ) status unless we, too, pony up more cash for our service. It’s time to admit that the internet is a public utility, not a private “service.”

Incredible to witness pure greed destroying human invention. What a despicable display of arrogance mingled with ignorance. Makes me consider moving to another country to invest my tax dollars there, permanently. So much for the fake American dream. Land of the fee, home of the wage slaves.

I won't be the only one. You have made the single greatest ignorant choice imaginable. Shame the only language you pay attention to is money. I'm embarrassed to live on this continent because of your ignorant actions today. Disgusted at the unrelenting greed choking the life from the wage slaves.

If our internet is to become like the monopolies of the Industrial Revolution, it becomes less of a space to express and innovate. If this proposal is approved, the internet will become a place of inequality, with big corporations squishing smaller competitors. Ladies and gentlemen of Congress, the internet is one of the biggest steps forward our species has ever made. The industrial revolution drove innovation forward faster than any other event in history, and every development since then has hurried our advancement even more. The internet isn't just a medium for entertainment or business--it's a lifeline to visionaries without the means to accomplish their goals in any other fashion.

Abandoning net neutrality in favor of corporations isn't just morally reprehensible, it's blind. Throttling bandwidth, censoring content, and essentially creating a micro-oligarchy in America isn't just uncomfortable. Another country, one that respects freedom of speech and information, would simply take our place. They would use the tool we've abandoned and outpace us technologically and economically at an incredible rate.

As a citizen, I implore you to consider that the repercussions of such a decision might, in mere decades, bring America to its knees.

Corporations once thought of the Net as a joke, a hobby that only computer nerds played with.

Corporations were the last ones to come in on the Web and set up sites.

Think about who actually started the Net community. It was the common people. We took the apparatus available and built it up.

Now you want to let the rich corporations control it.

If you do this, then you allow them to own you. When I say own you, I mean how a Pimp owns a little tramp on the streets.

Hello, my name is Rocio Diaz and I am writing this message because I want to stop corporate internet takeover. I live in a very small town in Texas and I am about to join the U.S. navy. My parents will have custody of my daughter and they can't afford the cost of internet going up. I want to communicate frequently with my daughter and the only way I can see her face live would be over the internet. I would hate for them to terminate their internet over costs and thus communication between families to become harder. Please do not allow this corporate internet takeover to happen, from a future navy sailor. Thank you.

All we ever hear from our government officials (the elected ones, anyway) is that "this great nation was built on the backs of the middle class, the working class." But when push comes to shove, it's still the fat cats (the big corporations) who call the shots. They're trying again to muscle in on "territory" that has served "the little guy" (read: individual citizens, as well as many, many small businesses) since the advent of the Internet. NOW IT'S TIME TO DO THE RIGHT THING FOR ALL OUR CITIZENS! We demand action for free and open democratic media, not platitudes which are smokescreens for corporate domination of the Internet. We DEMAND that Net Neutrality be guaranteed!

Dear FCC:

One can see from the amazing changes the Internet has brought that its present form is invaluable. Access needs to be available to all users in as neutral and transparent manner as possible. If companies want to use ultra highspeed lines at their ISP sites then good for them, and good too for the users who will receive faster service. Already today, the user can get different speed access lines and their throughput will reflect this choice. Metering traffic beyond this natural technical limitation should never be allowed.

thank you

It is essential that the FCC do everything in its power to insure that internet providers are not allowed to promote or favor any content, service, or communications over any other. In other words, the internet MUST remain 'net neutral'.

The internet is more than a series of privately owned gateways. It is how we communicate, share, and do business in this early part of the the twenty-first century. Preferring any content or service over any other defeats a free and open market place of ideas, and reduces the internet to a large commercial broadcast channel and is anti-competitive.

I urge the FCC to build a high wall between the provision of internet connectivity and the sales and distribution of any content or service. Internet providers must provide free and open access to all internet content without preference.

The Internet is the equivalent of FREE SPEECH. If the citizenry is put in a situation by the government (which exists and is sworn to preserve, protect, and defend the Constitution of The United States which guarantees freedom of speech, freedom of the press, etc.) then what those enablers have done is hijack and render meaningless the law of the land; and abrogated their sworn duties under our Constitution - and will thus be liable for INDIVIDUAL criminal prosecution. If a citizen's speech can be effectively limited or restricted because they have not paid THE KING (in its essence) for the right to have what one has to say heard - then freedom of speech effectively no longer exists (but for those who can pay the highest premium to secure it).

The Internet has always been a level playing field for anyone to put out content, creativity, innovation and information. It's what's made independent media outlets like Democracy Now! reach a massive audience that would otherwise be relegated to choosing from corporate media channels like Fox News. It's the lifeline that allows small innovators to create a service that reaches almost everyone on the globe.

This proposed rule change would only create a monopoly of the largest and richest broadband providers, like Comcast, AT&T and Verizon, that just benefits their shareholders.

When Avaaz and partner organisations brought a million signatures to his FCC Chief commissioner Tom Wheeler's office, he was quick to support an open Internet. But now, instead of following through with his promise, he's caving in to industry pressure.

It's time to ensure the US follows the global move to protect the Internet by committing to new rules that prevent Internet providers from slicing up our Internet into slow and fast lane access.

Monopolies are illegal in the United States. Do your job - uphold the law and block this move!

We are watching, and we aren't going away!

The ISP's need to be classified just like phone companies.

The Internet is a utility just like other things that people use and need all the time.

Title II Common Carrier is the only way to go. Anything else would be foolish and hurt all consumers.

Dear FCC,

We need Net Neutrality, not big telecom companies slowing the internet down or blocking everyone. Our internet must stay free and open. I do not agree with the proposal that the US communications regulator is deciding on.

To Whom It May Concern,

An open and free Internet has been, is currently and should be in the future the most equalizing tool for research and education that the modern age possesses. In its current state, it provides anyone with access to the Internet the same ability to research topics and educate themselves. This should not ever be compromised.

Allowing Internet access based on speed and ability to pay will only further divide the country and the world into those who have and those who have not. This would be unacceptable!

Please do not allow the Telecommunication Giants to do this!

Internet access should be a public service, not a privately controlled profit source. This proposal would enable private telecom firms to eliminate the internet presence of all but the wealthiest groups, effectively terminating freedom of speech in the broadest medium of the modern age. I sincerely hope that the relevant decision makers within the FCC consider the broader implications of this decision before caving to telecom lobbyists.

This is an outrage! Obama promised net neutrality. What is his (or any other political promise) worth?

Zip. I reckon 90% of people in office are guilty of bait and switch...this is another classic.

The corporate "fix" is in, again.

And with the Courts (stacked with pro-corporate appeasers and fund-raisers) we've just about put "America on eBay" – available for the taking by the shock troops of K-street.

Government has become a big pop machine: Put money in, and out pops corporate policy.

Is that what the Founders envisioned? Is that what our Service members fought and died for?

If this the "Slow Lane" proposal goes through, you will be remembered in the same way that Hearst and other Robber Barons are. This proposal will damage the net, hurt innovation, and damage America's overall place in the world.

The people who are lobbying you have been proven wrong on this every single time they try to defend it... but by ignoring the complaints of the overall majority you are giving into the darkness of liars.

If you ignore cable companies and fight for the internet, you will position yourself well for the future campaigns.

PLEASE reconsider this. I know you are being inundated right now with angry emails... please understand that we feel helpless fighting the destruction of something we built by a group of corrupt companies who have already received 200 billion in aid that they squandered away without results.

Thanks for your time,

Please vote for Net Neutrality today. Keep our Internet free and open. Please do NOT give in to the large corporations greed and self-serving demands. We already have too many large corporations controlling our lives. Thank you.

To Chairman Tom Wheeler and the FCC Commissioners——

FCC—
The 21st century internet is an integral part of our economy, democracy, and communication systems. America is absolutely dependent on an open internet operating on net neutrality principles.

As such, you have an obligation to regulate it as a utility. Please assert your Title II authority, and stop trying to appease the telecom giants at the expense of everyone else.

The day is coming for "YOUR TIME" to pay for your evil deeds and the horrible harm and corruption you and others like you, and also those in government, have pulled on us in this once "FREE" and beautiful country that up to now have gone unanswered by American citizens!

But it is coming...coming...coming... You just don't "get it"! Watch out!! The "people" are truly ANGRY!!

To whom it may concern,

I am writing you in order to point out to you my support for protecting the Internet. I am aware that you will be voting on a proposal that would allow AT&T, Comcast and other big companies to control who will benefit from fast Internet. We cannot let this happen, the Internet being the only medium that is still equal to everyone. This regulation would hinder small companies from getting the same benefit from the Internet as the big companies (who can afford to pay for fast speed).

I believe one of the Internet's principals is for everyone to have equal access AND speed, etc.

Please support what is right.

Subject: Open Internet - An American Invention, An American Ideal
Dear Commissioners, Politicians, Americans,

Honestly, I am shocked. Shocked at the need for this letter. Shocked by the uncertainty of our values. Shocked by the weakness of our resolve. Shocked by the speed of our forgetting.

The issue of net neutrality is not a partisan issue. It does not fall along liberal and conservative lines. It is not an issue complex and fraught as many with the opposition of different values, or principles. It is an opposition between those who remember the principle values of this country and those who would rather forget them.

The internet has radically changed almost every aspect of our lives. It has provided an unprecedented openness and equality of information. Unbarred access to knowledge as no other event since the overthrow of monarchy. It's transformative power need not be argued as most of us have experienced it directly. The internet is the most important invention of our time, and the internet is an American invention.

In this I do not refer solely to its history. It's early days tested on the west coast of this country and its development in campuses, factories, schools, and institutions across this land. I would argue that more importantly the ideal underlying the internet is an American ideal, a democratic ideal.

The idea that open public infrastructures can amplify the potentials of all people and businesses, underpinned the roads, rail, and telephone lines run cross this country. The idea that information should be accessible, that education could emancipate humanity, led to the public schools and world respected institutes of education, our most valued product. The idea that the equality of all offered the greatest chance of individual advancement was inscribed in our founding texts, in our institutions, in our spirit, and with our blood.

Spurn the hypocrites who argue that those with the buying power should with greedy hands manipulate the flows of this the greatest knowledge stream in human history. Spurn those who forget the ideals of their country for capital. Spurn those who follow the function but forget the single fundamental principle. Those who see the internet as simply a vehicle for the paid distribution of content are sound capitalists but they are hardly Americans. The internet is the radical medium, the distributed connection, the small voice can sounding aside the large voice, equal, open, and not for sale. The internet is not simply a technical invention, and this a discussion of policy and regulation. It is an American invention and this a test of America's ideals.

Sincerely,

Robert Estrin

Dear FCC,

Please do not provide any avenues for there to be EVER any payment of additional speed of the internet. Do not let companies charge for faster service. If you give a company an inch they will take MILES!!!

There is already a digital divide in this country this would just make it worse.

I agree with FCC Chairman Tom Wheeler

"There is one Internet. It must be fast, it must be robust, and it must be open..the prospect of a gatekeeper choosing winners and losers on the Internet is unacceptable."

I do think that paid prioritization should be banned outright!!

please do not approve any proposal that will kill the internet as we know it. The current generation, and older generations who struggle to keep up with those who grew up with the internet as if it always existed, as well as the rest of us -- we all rely heavily on the internet as it currently exists, every day, and every minute and every second, even split second, of every day. We cannot afford to let the FCC destroy the fastest and best form of communication that is a vast improvement over the telephone. Because it is so fast, it is often the best form of communication yet, and far better than telephones which have many deterrents that are not mentioned here.

We cannot afford to allow Comcast, AT&T and any of the other large corporations, including the existing telecommunication companies, to impose any restrictions on the internet as it currently exists.

It is urgent that we retain Net neutrality as long as humanly possible. This is not a place for the FCC to allow the corporate giants to destroy such a fantastic mode of communication that will be destroyed if the FCC is able to impose the kinds of regulations that are contemplated.

Net neutrality is like freedom of speech. Stop it, and democracy as we know it is done. The Internet is too integral to the way the world works now. We give this up at our peril!

thank you

We do not need another censorship like this one to further delay and control messages over the internet. Big money should not get an opportunity to create problems here, either. Thank you for listening to "the people at the mercy of big money".

Commissioner,

Please keep the internet neutral. The FCC should inform the American public about the procedures that you are about to rule on that affects everyone. Please give the public the pros and cons of your decisions...why does the current state of the internet need to change? How do the changes benefit everyone or does it only benefit the select few businesses such as AT&T, Comcast etc. Why should the FCC pick winners and losers for control of the internet. The innovations made on the internet were done by individuals, businesses, government et al and not only by the companies the FCC seems to want to reward.

Some people think that the internet should become a public utility. If this is a viable option please have public hearings so Americans can enter into the debate.

The FCC should work for the American people and not for corporations solely.

Thank you for your consideration,

Please do not allow the COMCAST Time Warner merger and the control of internet speeds by BIG companies. The infrastructure of the United States needs to be upgraded and the prices of internet access needs to be reduced, our school children need access to it for education at home. Internet access should be a public utility for the growth of our economy and education of our children, in order for the United States to keep the lead in technology and education this tool needs to be priced and available for all. Think of the internet as a person shopping, the internet is a vehicle for access to countless buying choices and education and entertainment. Do you remember when only a few people had phones? The internet is not a luxury but is needed in every home.

Big telecom companies cannot be allowed to manipulate the populace by controlling Internet speeds. Net neutrality allows the internet to be a resource for as many people as can access it in whatever ways they need to access it. Destroying that neutrality destroys the internet as we know it.

Don't let these telecom companies ruin the way so many of us attain information, resources, and even support.

Dear FCC,

I am writing to oppose rules that will allow for discrimination on the Internet - where the wealthy can purchase faster Internet service and everyone else continues to have slower service.

I do not want telecom giants and wealthy Internet companies to determine the future of the Internet. I want new ideas to flourish on the Internet and not be blocked because they do not have sufficient funds to purchase fast service and compete.

I do not want the Internet to be turned into another vehicle that allows money to flow from working Americans to the wealthiest -- where web-based services like Netflix purchase faster service and pass the costs on to consumers.

The proposal being considered would kill rather than protect Net Neutrality and allow rampant discrimination online. The Internet should be viewed as a public good and should be operated consistent with our rights to Freedom of Speech and Freedom of the Press. Turning the Internet into a pay to play scheme is unacceptable.

Despite the reasoned protests of thousands, the FCC has taken a step closer to ending net neutrality--a step that many see as taking us away from our democracy. Though the FCC has given its assurances that neutrality would be preserved, the effect of the latest action opens the door to the contrary. If you are serious about preserving equal internet access, the best way to do this would be to re-classify internet providers as utilities. I urge you to do this!

To Chairman Tom Wheeler and the FCC Commissioners——

FCC——

The 21st century internet is an integral part of our economy, democracy, and communication systems. America is absolutely dependent on an open internet operating on net neutrality principles.

As such, you have an obligation to regulate it as a utility. Please assert your Title II authority, and stop trying to appease the telecom giants at the expense of everyone else.

Thank you,

Joel Forbes

To the FCC—

Please build any net neutrality argument upon solid legal standing. Specifically, this means reclassifying broadband under Title II of the Telecommunications Act of 1934.

706 authority from the Telecommunications Act has been repeatedly struck down in court after legal challenges by telecom companies. Take the appropriate steps to prevent this from happening again.

Subject: Net Neutrality rules going forward.

Dear chairman and respected committee members,

My name is Jonathan Lamborn and I use the internet every day to pay my bills, talk to my friends, watch videos, explore new music, research how to fix my house, and even check to make sure I am paid correctly by my employer. Even though I don't use the internet everyday in my current profession, it does help me out everyday. My wife uses it for her work regularly, and has even been able to supplement our income with a hobby of hers by using the internet to connect to others with like interests.

I am writing you today to implore the FCC to classify Internet Service Providers as Title Two Common Carriers. This will help ensure that the future internet is as dynamic and shaped by those that offer the best services over the internet, rather than those that can pay to ensure their services are delivered quickest.

I am aware that there is tremendous pressure within the FCC, and from outside lobbyists, to allow ISP's to differentiate traffic on the internet, but I truly believe that it is not in the best interest of the general population of America. While cable companies and ISP in general do have the right to make a profit I believe that in allowing them to act in their best self interest it will only hurt society as a whole. There are many examples from around the world that demonstrate how encouraging ISP to compete with each other within common markets only leads to better and cheaper service for their users. Allowing ISP to differentiate internet traffic into different speeds will only encourage them to try and monopolize a market and hurt consumers overall.

So once again I implore the FCC to classify Internet Service Providers as Title Two Common Carriers, for the good of consumers everywhere.

Thank you for your time and attention on this matter.

I am a teacher of music and voice. I utilize the Internet for all my students. Also, my students utilize the Internet to do their studies. I also work with many of the underprivileged children, who would not have any money to pay for songs or learning materials on the Internet. Please keep the Internet open for the sake of our children and their futures!

Please don't destroy net neutrality. In the long run, it would be bad for EVERYBODY. The grand children of the men that would benefit from the destruction of net neutrality would be born into a world that offers less information at a much slower speed than there grand parents had access to! There would be more ignorant people in this world because of this terribly short sighted decision. People in general, wouldn't have access to a fast, free, unfiltered internet. The result would be a less educated population.

This is a very interesting time in earths history. Let's make our great great great grandchildren proud of our decisions today when they read about this revolutionary age of information and the choices we had to make regarding our privacy and the free exchange of knowledge.

Hello. I would like to start off with saying my peace about modern day television. I canceled my cable subscription a long time ago as I feel advertising has become more important than the shows they are supposed to provide breaks from. There have been numerous shows I have tried to watch (in the past) where the commercial breaks are as long as the show segments (5min. of show/5min. of commercials). On top of that, now there are the atrocious doodads that pop up DURING the show to REMIND you of what's playing next Wednesday. Not to mention the other bottom corner of the screen will have the never to be removed logo of whatever station the show is on. The point is: If I PAY MONEY to a cable company so i can watch TV, I'm doing it to watch the shows, not to try to watch a show while the screen is being bombarded with distracting nonsense and endless commercials. Tune in to any chanel like T.N.T. or T.B.S. and I'd bet you ten bucks you can't get five minutes of a movie on the screen without either a commercial break or some nonsensical icon popping up on screen. If you fixed these problems, I (and many more people) would reclaim our TV subscriptions. This is why I stream shows from the internet. Thank you for your time.

The Internet is a Public Utility:

“The people are the only legitimate fountain of power, and it is from them that the constitutional charter, under which the several branches of government hold their power, is derived.” – James Madison

Yes, the Internet is a PUBLIC UTILITY! It is NOT a private road which the tele-communications corporations can allow me to access, or not, at their pleasure. The internet was built by the public, and we have allowed these corporations to participate, not the other way around.

Chairman Wheeler, it is high time the Federal Communications Commission classified the Internet as the Public Utility that it is! The Internet has become a primary source of information and a principal means of communication for many Americans, this elder citizen included.

Keep the Internet open to the people, prevent the mega-tele-coms from hijacking the peoples media, declare it as the Public Utility that it is, and regulate the internet for the benefit of the people!

Bless these United States and the more perfect union we strive to achieve.

The 21st century internet is an integral part of our economy, democracy, and communication systems. America is absolutely dependent on an open internet operating on net neutrality principles.

As such, you have an obligation to regulate it as a utility. Please assert your Title II authority, and stop trying to appease the telecom giants at the expense of everyone else.

To: The FCC,

I do not fall for deceit packaged as pragmatism, Gentlemen. Paid prioritization is a provision for monopolistic and cartelized telecoms providers to tax data value. This is not a market and the government will not regulate the consequent mess.

The argument that paid prioritization is illegal until defended in court is fraudulent. Under what terms would violations be brought to court? How would policing and prosecution be allocated and funded? What would be the sufficient defense?

This is obviously allowing money to control the regulation of the internet and is unacceptable.

Subject: The only ones to benefit are the ISP's.
Dear FCC,

I fail to see how the proposed open internet rules benefit anyone but the ISP's. They already charge premium prices to consumers so they can have internet speeds that allow streaming. Now they want to charge content providers for a "Fast Lane" to quickly deliver content to their customers. So the ISP's get to charge extra both to the consumer and the content provider with no added benefit to either party. In addition, the rules will stifle innovation and small internet businesses as only the large companies will be able to afford this supposed premium service. Please explain to the public how any of this benefits them.

Also, allowing one day for public is rather sneaky and again not in the public interest. Last time I checked your work is paid for by the American taxpayer and not the corporate special interests. Maybe you should start acting like it.

Regards,

Paul Hathaway

I support maintaining Net Neutrality. There have so many bills in our state legislature intended to quiet the voices of the middle and low class Americans, women and their reproductive rights, ease to vote, etc. the list can go on and on. Now, this intention is about to quiet our ability to get the word out to millions by making it more difficult for a middle/low income class individual like myself about matters that are important for people like me. This is just another step to take away our rights and to quiet us down. Do not implement this type of internet restrictive regulations. Don't be another that bows down to the greedy. The love if Money is truly the root if all evil.

Allowing internet service providers to create internet “fast lanes” and “slow lanes” would do nothing more than allow them to extort payments from companies like Netflix. It’s time to admit that the internet is a public utility, not a private “service.”

One of the great qualities of the United States has been a reasonably level playing field (relative to other countries anyway) for people to advance their lives.

This quality has created an atmosphere of innovation which has served our economy and citizens well and provides a sense of freedom not experienced elsewhere.

However, when access to information through public media especially in this era of advanced technology, is stunted to the general public and further shifted to those with money and influence to further ensure their control, the playing field is destroyed.

Please vote and work to keep the Internet equally accessible to all, neutral, and unavailable for purchase by corporations or anyone (ever) so that no entity or individual has an Internet speed or affordability advantage.

Thank you for "listening".

What the FCC is considering to introduce as regulation is completely counter to everything the internet has stood for since inception. The only people that would benefit from imposing such rules on the internet are major telecom companies in their quest to increase profits of themselves and shareholders. Companies like Comcast who PROFITED

$1.9 BILLION in the first THREE MONTHS of 2014. While those who will suffer are smaller start up companies, new job growth, and American innovation and ingenuity.

I hope you will see the folly in this proposal and change course before it is too late.

I ask just one question - how would passage of this proposal level the playing field allowing "equal access" of internet use? Passage of this proposal would widen the gap between those who can and those who cannot. Other countries have denied proposals of this type. Will America follow suit or continue to support the gluttonous and self-serving? I'm hoping equal opportunity still means something.

Why is the internet considered so important to people in our first-world society? The internet has become a place of communication and information sharing for people around the world, a place for ideas new and old to grow and be shared at speeds that would have been considered science-fiction years ago. But if the proposal that is currently being considered goes through, all of that would change. Companies would be able to pick and choose who would receive fast internet speeds, while leaving others to try and navigate this fast-paced, technologically driven world at a snail's pace. Some jobs that are dependent upon the internet and the resources it provides would be lost.

If the companies were to slow the internet speeds, it could also mean a difference in the life or death of someone in the event of an emergency. If someone cannot look up their symptoms quickly due to their slowed internet speeds, they may not know that they may be having a heart attack or a stroke or some other serious medical emergency. While 911 is vital in helping people in emergencies, some people may not wish to call for an ambulance until they know for sure that they are experiencing something that they would require assistance with (which they wouldn't be able to do quickly should the proposal go through).

So please, do not allow this proposal to go through.

The internet is the arterial system providing information and stimulating creativity for all of America, indeed the world. It must be easily and evenly available to all. If sections of the body are effectively restricted by tariffs and discrimination, some parts will flourish, some will fail. Eventually the whole body will die, defeated by the imbalance.

Keep the system open,keep it fair and balanced, don't let greed privatize communication, thought.

I strongly support legislation that ensures an open Internet - net neutrality.

It is critical that all data on the Internet be treated equal. Allowing access providers to charge more and throttle bandwidth limits innovation and customer choice. Companies like Comcast and AT&T/ direct tv already charge me so much each month for content I don't want and with Comcast they force me to buy tv/ Internet when I don't use their Internet. Monopolies drive up prices and aren't good for the market

Thanks

Subject: In opposition to Chairman Wheeler's proposed FCC regulation to permit price discrimination in access to websites
Dear FCC: I opposed any proposal for "net neutrality" that doesn't conform to net neutrality as defined by Professor of Law, Tim Wu, of Columbia University. To wit:

Network neutrality is best defined as a network design principle. The idea is that a maximally useful public information network aspires to treat all content, sites, and platforms equally. This allows the network to carry every form of information and support every kind of application. The principle suggests that information networks are often more valuable when they are less specialized – when they are a platform for multiple uses, present and future. (For people who know more about network design, what is just described is similar to the "end-to-end" design principle).

Professor Tim Wu, in relevant part, at: http://www.timwu.org/network\_neutrality.html. In other words net neutrality on the Internet requires that ISPs be deemed to be and classified as what they in fact are, that is, as telecommunications services. As you know, it is within the FCC's power to reclassify ISPs as telecommunication services. Once the FCC has reclassified ISPs as telecommunications services, then, according the D.C. Circuit's (Court's) reasoning in striking down the FCC's 2010 Open Internet Order, it seems likely, even probable, that, once the FCC reclassifies ISPs as telecommunication services and then reinstituted its 2010 Open Internet Order (Order), the Court would then hold that the Order to be a proper exercise of the FCC's authority pursuant to Title II of the Communications Act.

Indeed, reclassifying ISPs as telecommunication services seems to be the only way to achieve net neutrality and is the only way to establish net neutrality in a way that can survive judicial scrutiny. See <https://cyberlaw.stanford.edu/blog/2014/05/net-neutrality%E2%80%99s-legal-binary-either-or-no-%E2%80%9Cthird-way%E2%80%9D>, where Marvin Ammori, Esq. clearly shows why, given the Court's recent holding striking down the Order, reclassifying ISPs as telecommunications services is the only way to establish and guarantee net neutrality. In short, the Court held that to regulate ISPs as common carriers with a common carrier's obligations, pursuant to Title II of the Communications Act, to provide the Internet on a reasonable and nondiscriminatory terms, ISPs must be classified as telecommunication services, rather than as they now are as information services. Until the FCC classifies ISPs as telecommunications services, any attempt by the FCC to impose the common carrier obligations to provide Internet access on reasonable and nondiscriminatory terms on ISPs, so as to restrain or in any way interfere with an ISP's individualized bargaining with providers of content about the terms of access to Internet services, is beyond the ambit the FCC's legal authority and is, therefore, invalid. Id.

So, if the FCC wants to achieve any measure of legally mandated, true net neutrality, the Court's holding, supra, gives the FCC no choice but to reclassify to ISPs as telecommunication services and then impose the common carrier obligations of net neutrality on ISPs, for, after the Court's holding, supra, there is no other way to obtain net neutrality which requires ISPs to offer Internet services on reasonable and nondiscriminatory terms, and for the FCC to be able to also otherwise regulate ISPs as common carriers.

In addition to the foregoing analysis, which establishes that reclassification of ISPs is necessary to provide net neutrality, price discrimination on a content provider's speed of access to users of the Internet is a patent violation of U.S. antitrust law, violating sections one and two of the Sherman Act (15 U.S.C. Chapter 1, §§ 1 and 2) and the Robinson-Patman Act (15 U.S.C. § 13). Those violation would only be made legal, if at all, by an FCC regulation that permits ISPs to engage in price discrimination against content and/or providers of content by providing different speeds of access to users of the Internet based on discriminatory pricing. Yet, even if the FCC can authorize such price discrimination as an exception to U.S. antitrust law, it should not do so, because that would have the effect of suppressing competition in the markets for content and for providers of content. It is easy to see how this will happen. A regulation, which permitted ISP to discriminate among content or providers of content based on price, would allow Comcast and other ISPs, which provide original and/or sub-licensed content, to raise the price of competing content, e.g., Netflix, so as to increase their competitive advantage against that competing content, not by competing but by using their exclusive control of broadband Internet service to raise the price that competing content must pay to have fair and equal access to users of that competing content. That is a patent violation of antitrust law, or it would be unless it is shielded by an FCC regulation that permits price discrimination against content and/or providers of content, as it would be the use of a facility, speed of access to users of the Internet, that is unrelated to competition to hinder competition among content and/or providers of content. Therefore, but for an FCC proposal that permits price discrimination against content or the providers of content, an ISP, which uses price to discriminate against content or a provider of content, violates Sherman 1 and 2 and the Robinson-Patman Act in ways that will almost certainly lessen or at least significantly threaten competition in the markets for content and for providing content on the Internet.

Therefore, based on the foregoing analysis and argument, the FCC should permanently set aside any and all proposed rules that would permit any type of price discrimination or unreasonable discrimination on access to the Internet and/or users of the Internet; it should instead vote to reclassify ISPs as telecommunication services; it should then reinstitute its 2010 Open Internet Order on ISPs as telecommunication services, and then impose whatever additional common carrier obligations that it deems necessary and/or advisable to provide for and guarantee to the American people access to Internet on reasonable and nondiscriminatory terms for users of the Internet and for providers of content.

LEAVE THE INTERNET ALONE FOR THE SAKE OF ALL.

Please protect Internet neutrality. We don't want to have the Internet working at different speeds, depending on whether you can pay for a faster access. We don't want our favorite sites to be block just because they don't have money to compete with giant companies.

Net neutrality has been a big part of the growth of the tech industry over the last two decades. Treating all internet traffic as equal is simply fair - why change that? Consumers are already charged for the total amount of bandwidth they use. As I understand it, the current proposal to scrap net neutrality benefits a few internet service providers at the cost of the rest of society. Don't do it!
